There are certain essentials to consider when choosing a bar table, the store says. Any table that is higher than a standard table (typically about 75 cm tall) is referred to as a bar table or high table. These tall tables, also called counter height and pub tables, sit at approximately 110cm high making them suited to use whilst standing or perched on high bar stool. Bar tables are available in a variety of models, and the design that is ultimately chosen will depend on the available space and the customer?s individual requirements.

The size and shape of the table, which is typically round, square, or rectangular, should be chosen to accommodate the expected number of guests. The size of the room is another important factor to consider. For a smaller space, a counter-height table works well.

The table's material should be selected to coordinate with the room's design and furniture (classic, rustic, industrial, contemporary, etc.). Along with the various benefits, drawbacks, and costs of each model, customers also need to consider how they will care for different materials. Bar tables can be made from a variety of materials, including solid wood, composite wood, chipboard, safety glass, metal, and stone.

A bar table's shape will determine both how it looks overall and how many people it can seat. Round bar tables are perfect for smaller spaces because they tend not to overpower their surroundings. These small models, which are typically supported by a single leg, have a tiny tabletop (approximately 60 cm) and typically have two or three seats. When compared to a traditional dining table, square bar tables are unique ? and can even be placed in a corner if the customer does not anticipate hosting many guests or simply wishes to create more space.

Materials are an important consideration when selecting a bar table for home or commercial use. Replica Furniture uses only the highest quality fit-for-purpose materials in the construction of their bar tables. Solid ash timber is used the construction of their bar tables, avoiding inferior wood-based materials like laminates and melamine made of chipboard covered in resin, which are less durable. Solid wood and marble tabletops are typically favoured for their robustness and natural appearance. However, they do require some maintenance and can be sensitive to heat, water and chemicals which renders them best for indoor use. When selecting a bar table for use in the great Australian outdoors, the right materials are essential. Materials such as UV-stabilised acrylic and aluminium are favoured to withstand harsh Australian conditions.

There may be a few different features on bar tables that are intended to make them easier to use or store. Since they can be folded out when needed and put away when finished, foldaway tables are excellent for occasional use. In compact areas, these tables come in especially handy.

Replica Furniture offers a wide range of models sure to suit any customer?s requirements.
