Your Local Mould Removal, a mould remediation service in Sydney, NSW, Australia, has recently released a blog post that explains the primary causes of black mould, which isn't just a stain or black mark on the wall but can also be a health hazard. Black mould, which has the scientific name of Stachybotrys chartarum, is more than just an ugly black spot on walls or ceilings. Exposure to this type of fungus can result into an array of health problems, such as allergic reactions, respiratory problems, and in severe cases, harmful neurological issues. They have released this blog post to help people avoid black mould in their homes and to offer solutions to better protect themselves.

One of the primary causes of black mould is a humidity level that is above 50 percent. Black mould grows well in damp environments, which is why they are often found in the bathroom, laundry room, and basement. If there is poor ventilation, the humidity level remains high, which allows the mould to thrive in these areas. To prevent this, homeowners can make sure that these places have good air circulation. Air conditioners or dehumidifiers can be used, or the homeowners can simply air out the rooms to keep the humidity levels down and prevent the growth of black mould.

A spokesperson for Your Local Mould Removal says, "Water leaks belong to the top when it comes to the main causes of black mould. Leaky pipes, roofs, or walls allow moisture to sneak into your home, creating the perfect damp environment for black mould to start its rave. Small, unnoticed leaks can be particularly problematic as they allow the mould to grow and spread undetected. Therefore, it's crucial to regularly inspect your home for any signs of water damage. Don't just rely on visible signs, use your nose too! A musty smell can often be a tell-tale sign of mould growth. It's a bit like smelling the barbecue before you see the smoke. So, let's keep our senses sharp, and boot black mould off the guest list."

Another cause of black mould is condensation. Cold surfaces, such as metal pipes or poorly insulated walls and windows, tend to produce condensation. When warm air meets cold surfaces, moisture is produced, which creates an environment where black mould thrives. This can be prevented by properly insulating the home to prevent condensation.

Insufficient ventilation is another cause of black mould. This is because it results into a stagnant atmosphere that allows black mould to thrive. Adequate ventilation doesn't just mean having windows and fans. It means there is a balance the outgoing moisture and incoming fresh air. Exhaust fans can be used to reduce indoor humidity in kitchens and bathrooms. A high-quality air exchange system may also be used to ensure adequate ventilation.

Finally, poor cleaning practices can also lead to black mould thriving in the home. Black mould tend to prefer places where there is a lot of dirt, dust, and organic materials. Thus, regularly cleaning, such as dusting, mopping, and vacuuming, can substantially help in preventing black mould from thriving in the home. It is important to focus on those areas that are usually overlooked, such as under sinks, inside cabinets, and behind furniture. These are the usual places where black mould can thrive in. It is equally important to watch out for those damp surfaces or materials in the home, such as bathmats, wet towels, or spills. These should be allowed to dry as quickly as possible because they provide the perfect environment for black mould to grow.
