The ADA, or Americans with Disabilities Act, obliges a range of locations, organizations, businesses and so on to ensure people with physical or sensory disabilities are accommodated in a reasonable manner. All Things Inspector advises the community to take a proactive approach where ADA compliance is concerned as this will help make access to service or products more equitable. It will also prevent them from suffering any legal penalties.

Anyone who works in construction, owns a business or who may simply wish to ensure a property they are interested in is ADA-compliant can make use of the company's products. In addition to making locations more hospitable for people with disabilities, it should be understood that being found non-compliant with ADA guidelines can lead to extremely strict fines, among other consequences (depending on state and local requirements). As such, it is in every property's best interests to ensure that future ADA inspections will not lead to such outcomes.

There are many resources available for those who wish to determine whether they are compliant. Certain businesses, for instance, provide accessibility inspections when requested, but these require some financial investment to engage. As such, those who are determined to be non-compliant may find themselves unnecessarily having to pay for repeat inspections. Fortunately, there is an easy, straightforward way to minimize this possibility: the tools and templates that are manufactured in-house by All Things Inspector.

Conversely, the company is pleased to work with businesses that provide inspections. Since All Things Inspector follows a standardized approach, customers can expect the company's tools and template to be of a consistent quality. As such, the same type of tool may be deployed across multiple properties for their respective inspections, and the quick visual reference it provides can speed up each step of an inspection. In turn, this gives inspection services more time to focus on their clients.

One example of this is the company's ADA Measuring Tape, which can be used to check ADA sink clearances. Those who have used this tool already may know it as the ADA Template, but it has been used extensively to ensure accessibility for individuals with disabilities at sinks in public facilities.

All Things Inspector manufactures each tool in accordance with the ADA Standards for Accessible Design. The company advises customers to check the most recent version of these standards to ensure their tool is still up to date prior to use. All Things Inspector refreshes its inventory when necessary, but older purchases should always be checked with each update.

Presently, the guidelines regarding sink clearance say that sinks must rise no higher than 34" above the floor. They must also have a clear floor space in front of them that measures at least 30" x 48". Further, each sink should have a knee clearance of at least 27" high, 30" wide and 11" deep. These dimensions can all be checked quickly with the ADA Measuring Tape.

All Things Inspector assures inspectors that their tools can be customized to present a more professional veneer. Customers may therefore let the company know if they would like a business name, website or other identifying information added to their tool for a small fee. Engravings can be made as well, either for text or images (such as a logo).

Interested parties are invited to place their orders with All Things Inspector today. The company's inventory includes tools that measure knee and door clearance, door gaps, toilet clearances and more.
