The firm states, ?There are many situations in which a person may die as the result of misconduct or negligence of another party. If this is the case, the surviving members of the victim's family may sue for wrongful death. At Kenneth S. Nugent, P.C., we are ready and willing to pursue the highest compensation possible on your behalf, both as a form of justice and to secure your own future.?

Notably, the firm says it is not uncommon for wrongful death cases to proceed after a criminal trial. Should the party or parties responsible have been convicted of a crime, it is still recommended that financial compensation be pursued via a wrongful death claim as this is often the only way for the deceased individual?s surviving family to meet any related financial obligations.

One example of this is in cases where the deceased was a significant (or even the sole) income earner in their family. The reparations paid for their passing would have to cover this lost income in addition to a host of other expenses that may have been necessary as a direct result of the incident that led them to lose their life.

Wrongful death settlements consider the deceased person's loved ones and their needs, and this consideration extends to their emotional requirements as well as more practical or measurable concerns (such as living expenses, medical bills and so on). This is why settlements will also account for the pain and suffering the loved one experienced before they passed, the loss of love and companionship their family once received, emotional anguish and more.

Some may be tempted to file a claim on their own, perhaps believing that they will be able to navigate the legal process without the help of a professional. While it is true that everyone has the right to do this, it is an extremely inadvisable endeavor. As the firm points out, survivors will likely be going up against an insurance company when they file a claim, and such companies are likely to have the assistance of some of the most aggressive lawyers in the field.

The only way to assure the highest chance of a positive outcome ? and compensation that is worth the effort ? is to work with a legal team that understands the tactics that will be used by the opposition and how best to counter them. Further, Kenneth S. Nugent, P.C. in particular has a wealth of resources and connections that they are more than ready to utilize on a client?s behalf.

For instance, the firm?s experience with such cases means they understand what manner of proof is needed to substantiate a claim. Surviving family members should take the time and space to grieve their lost loved one in peace, and they will have this when they work with Kenneth S. Nugent, P.C. The firm will gather evidence, interview witnesses and contact their expansive network of trusted experts to build a solid case.

Similarly, they know how to calculate damages as accurately as possible, maintaining realistic expectations while making sure no factors have been left unaccounted for. The firm has an established methodology for quantifying damages via formulas and so on, and they will meet any opposing team?s legal team with equal or greater force.
