Slavin Home Improvements, a company offering the services of roofers in Manchester CT and surrounding areas has recently published a blog post that explains the causes of roof stains and how to clean them up. Such roof stains are a typical concern for homeowners, and understanding their causes and effective cleaning solutions is vital for preserving a healthy and attractive roof. It is important to note that while they don?t clean up roof stains, Slavin Home Improvements can offer in-depth inspections, roof repairs, and roof replacements.

There are a number of causes of roof stains. These include: algae and moss growth, lichen and fungi, airborne contaminants, and water stains. The growth of algae and moss is one of the main causes of roof stains. They thrive in areas that are damp and shaded and they can spread across the roof, resulting into dark stains and streaks. Algae usually forms blackish or blue-green stains on roof shingles. Other organisms that can cause stains on the roof are lichen and fungi. Lichen, which is a combination of fungi and algae, creates a crusty growth on the roof surface, while fungi can cause black or green stains. As with algae and moss growth, lichen and fungi tend to grow on roofs that are damp and don?t get enough sunlight.

Meanwhile, airborne contaminants like pollution, industrial residue, and dust can accumulate on the roof over time. When mixed with moisture, these contaminants can form stains on the roof. The moisture can be provided by rainwater, resulting into ugly stains on the roof. And finally, leaks or improper drainage can also cause water stains on the roof. These are brownish stains that can spread quickly across the roof unless the underlying problem is addressed fast. Water stains may also be signs of more severe issues such ass roof leaks that can damage the structural integrity of the roof and the home.

The Manchester CT roofers advise homeowners to check their roofs regularly to prevent the accumulation of roof stains. Doing a number of things regularly, such as cleaning gutters, removing debris, and trimming overhanging branches, can help avoid those conditions that tend to help with the growth of algae, moss, and other stains.

When cleaning roof stains, they advise homeowners to always choose biodegradable solutions in order to avoid causing harm to plants and the environment. Mixtures of water, oxygen bleach, and mild detergent are usually effective in getting rid of roof stains without damaging the roof surface nor the environment. Another way of cleaning roof stains is pressure washing. This is often used for stubborn stains. However, it is important to use low-pressure settings to ensure that the shingles are not damaged by the force of the water under them. Getting professional pressure washing services can make sure that the right pressure is used to ensure a safe but thorough cleaning process.

And finally, installing zinc strips along the edge of the roof can help in avoiding the growth of lichen, algae, and moss. The small amounts of zinc that leach onto the roof when it rains will prevent the growth of those organisms.
