There are various types of wood flooring available, such as: engineered, solid, parquet, laminate, vinyl, reclaimed, and wood effect tiles. Engineered wood flooring is made up of a thin hardwood layer with one or more plywood layers. It offers the benefit of ease of installation, cleaning, and maintenance. It is also budget-friendly but it is not possible to refinish it to modify its look and feel.

Solid wood flooring is made only from hardwood species with no synthetic material added. It offers the advantage of having a lifespan of up to 100 years and ability to increase property resale value. Its disadvantage is that it is harder to install compared to engineered wood flooring.

Parquet wood flooring is also made from hardwood but they can be arranged in a characteristics geometric mosaic pattern. Its advantage is that it can be refinished a number of times to refresh its look and it is durable and have a lifespan of 100 years. The only issue is that it is susceptible to UV and water damage.

Laminate flooring is made from a combination of wood, resin, fibreboard, and a design layer. It is made to look like wood and it is more resistant to dents and scratches compared to wood. It is also easier to install compared to natural wood floors. However, it is not possible to refinish it.

Vinyl flooring is made from PVC but it has been designed to look like wood. Its advantages include ease of cleaning and maintenance, and resistance to wear and water damage. A disadvantage is a lifespan with a maximum of 20 years, that is much shorter compared to that of natural wood.
