Anyone familiar with reality TV shows like TLC's "Hoarding: Buried Alive" have at least some idea how this little known disorder affects the lives of those faced by the mysterious phenomenon. The heightened exposure of this disorder has many folks in Indiana asking where they can turn for hoarder help. Scene Care, a cleaning company, has announced their services in the Madison, WI area.

One vital issue that local Madison, Wisconsin health care officials are seeing when it comes to the discovery of a hoarder is that even though a situation may exist, every person's private liberties need to be taken into account before anything is done about it.

A distinction should be made here between "collecting" and "hoarding". Anyone fearing they may likely be dealing with a hoarder needs to understand these differences first before confronting a person with the hoarder disorder. It is not recommended by experts to simply force the person to give up their belongings, and it is never a good idea to "trick" anyone from their home, so their property can be removed without their knowledge.

According to mental health professionals studying the phenomenon, this is the worst method of dealing with a hoarder situation, as the emotional, and psychological attachments the person has developed with the clutter could exacerbate the condition in the long-term once they are returned to their empty home.

After consulting a professional, and receiving proper treatment, those involved can eventually build up to the point where the person can accepted that there is an issue. Then they may be willing to let a specialized cleaning company enter and remove the mess from their home safely, quietly, and without causing further upset to the property owner.

Scene Care, Inc. is a company that provides these services, and has been in operation in the emergency cleanup market for 10 years. Their award winning service associates have been trained to discreetly handle all types of emergency scene cleaning from blood cleanup, to murder and suicide cleaning, unattended deaths, and in particular areas that have been affected by a hoarder.

A Scene Care representative says, "We have been providing this service for many years now, and our expertise in the procedures of dealing with sensitive cases like hoarding is vast. Our goal is to help people return their lives to normal, and help anyone involved to make the needed changes smoothly."
