ePharmacies.com has been praised for their work ever since the website first launched in 2003. The website has now announced a new price-comparison tool to help their users.

According to statistics, the gross revenue of pharmaceutical and prescription drug sales in the U.S. totals up to more than 2.6 million dollars for 2015. It seems astonishing but according to the spokesperson of ePharmacies.com, there are many ways Americans can reduce the cost they spend on their prescription drugs, without compromising their health or the quality of the medicine.

The website ePharmacies.com has been providing free prescription coupons, pharmacy reviews, pharmacy guides and links to licensed online pharmacies since 2003. The website claims that they have helped their users reduce their prescription medicine costs by 90%. They have now announced a new free tool that will help users share price comparisons and view price comparisons on a wide range of prescription medicines available at licensed pharmacies across U.S., both physical and online. The website claims that by comparing prices, users can further save costs on their medicines.

The spokesperson for ePharmacies.com spoke about the website and their new price comparison tool in an official press statement: "Ever since the website was formed in 2003, we have helped many U.S. citizens with reducing their medicine costs significantly while still buying from licensed sources so that the quality of the medicines is uncompromised. We are proud to say that we now have millions of loyal followers who have been able to use our site to read reviews, find licensed pharmacies and ultimately, save money."

He further spoke about the new tool: "We have now launched a new price comparison tool to help our users compare prices and see where they can get their prescription medicine at the least rates possible, that too from a licensed pharmacy."
