July 12, 2024 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Pinnacle Peak Recovery, of Scottsdale, Arizona, recently shared a blog shedding light on how often alcoholism is overlooked due to denial. With alcohol being a legal substance across the US, and a leading reason people go into recovery in the first place, they wanted to provide education on why denial happens. They hope this information will help readers understand more about alcoholism, how it happens, and how they might unknowingly contribute to stigma.

To start the piece, Pinnacle Peak explains how alcoholism denial comes in multiple forms. Denial can be internal, where they don't want to look inward and acknowledge a problem they are experiencing, but it can also be external. When it's external, they don't want others to acknowledge their alcoholism.

Readers might wonder when denial can become a sign of alcoholism, and Pinnacle Peak takes the time to go through common reasons this might occur. They stress that verbalized denial can stem from the approach to their view of themselves. Before readers potentially take the step to approach a loved one about alcohol use, the rehab center warns, "...it's important to consider all angles and look for other evidence whenever you want to approach someone about something serious."

"Alcoholism denial doesn't come out of nowhere." The rehab center continues. "One of the main reasons for denial when it comes to alcoholism is the social stigma and stereotypes of alcoholism. They might think of very specific things, like people who are loud and aggressive or abuse their partners because of alcohol use. They then look at themselves and go, "I don't do that, therefore I'm not an alcoholic."

Pinnacle Peak reveals that, in some cases, alcoholism denial can stem from everyone around a person, from family to friends. Often they don't want to face the feeling that their loved one might need help or that they might have contributed to their alcohol use. They might be ignoring their internal guilt over any number of things related to their loved one's alcohol use. Sometimes they want to shelter their loved one from any outside criticism or hurt.

The article takes the time to break down the ways readers can spot alcoholism denial in those around them, or even in themselves. They also offer links to additional resources so readers can feel prepared and better understand the topic.

Pinnacle Peak understands that many readers might feel compelled to approach their loved ones after reading their blog. This is why they take the time at the end of the piece to talk about the best practices for broaching this topic with those they care about. If you come up to your loved one aggressively or upset in any fashion, this won't help them open up and listen to what you have to say. Ask them if they can have an open and honest conversation with you. Remind them that you care about them and want to get onto the same page while also expressing your concerns. Be honest with them.

If readers wish to learn more about how to approach someone who's showcasing signs of alcoholism denial, the article will help all around. It not only provides background on why alcoholism denial often occurs but what steps readers can take to address it helpfully.
