Scottsdale, AZ ? Pinnacle Peak is a local rehab that recently published a blog sharing what drugs can cause permanent psychosis. Their program offerings are nationally recognized and evidence-based with Masters-level therapists.

?Psychosis is a collection of symptoms that most commonly relate to a person being disconnected from reality. ?Drug-induced? psychosis is when these symptoms occur as a result of drug use. This can be just as a side effect of specific drugs or as a result of withdrawal from certain drugs. Alcohol withdrawal, for example, is a common source of drug-induced psychosis,? the blog reads.

Psychosis doesn't appear suddenly or all at once, symptoms typically build. This can include experiencing difficulties sleeping, feeling on edge or restless, increased anxiety and stress, or feelings of fear. These can be an indicator that psychosis may happen. The exact causation of psychosis is still being studied. However, those who have experienced psychosis before are likely to have it happen again. Those with a predisposition to psychotic disorders are going to be more susceptible to drug-induced psychosis.

A person experiencing psychosis is disconnected from reality to a degree. While their exact level of disconnect can vary, the most common symptom is the difficulty distinguishing between what is real and what isn't. Some side effects include hallucinations ? when a person experiences something with one or more of their senses (i.e. smell, sight, hearing, touch, taste) that isn't there, and delusions ? when a person has a strong belief that is not commonly held by others around them. The most common delusion is that someone might be out to get them.

?The exact time frame for drug-induced psychosis can vary from person to person. Many different factors can impact the length of time that a person experiences psychosis. Some of the primary factors include their history of drug use, other substances in their system at the time, and also their own mental health or mental illnesses.

"For example, a person who might be already managing trauma could be more susceptible to psychosis than someone who isn't. Additionally, if a person continues to use the substance that triggered psychosis during their episode, it could elongate how long their psychosis lasts.

"The most common time frame for drug-induced psychosis is a few days to a few weeks. Drug-induced psychosis is normally temporary, but if someone is already predisposed to disorders that involve psychosis, those can be triggered by a drug-induced episode," the article continues.

The primary risk factor that comes from psychosis is the potential for harm, due to the main symptoms of psychosis being delusions and hallucinations. When the person is not in a stable state of mind, they could potentially see or hear something that isn't there and try to react accordingly. An example is meth mites, where those experiencing hallucinations due to meth use pick at their skin because they think there are bugs on or under it. Another common risk factor is overdosing. A person experiencing drug-induced psychosis may continue to use the substance that triggered it, increasing the chances of experiencing an overdose.
