East Sussex, United Kingdom - Winter ushers in a frigid type of weather, it also brings one of the most anticipated periods of the year. This is the festive season which normally runs from the second week in December to the second week in January. The joyous family time tends to showcase the most delightful forms of cuisine, and though the food tends to be very tasty it also can be very harmful for hypertensive people, of whom a few are children.

According to an article on the Kids Health website, babies, kids and teenagers can also be affected by high blood pressure also known as hypertension. High blood pressure in kids is usually caused by prematurity or difficulties with the heart or kidneys. While hypertension is far more common among adults, the rate among kids is on the rise, a trend that experts link to an immense increase in childhood obesity.

The Author stated, "Many kids and teens with high blood pressure have no other health problems but do have a family history of hypertension and an unhealthy lifestyle which may include, a bad diet, excess weight, stress, and too little physical activity. If it's not treated, high blood pressure can damage the heart, brain, kidneys, and eyes. But when hypertension is caught early, monitored, and treated, kids can lead an active, normal life.?

Hypertensive people are cognizant that hypertension is hereditary, this is why to safeguard their children many would invest in a blood pressure monitor to easily test the blood pressure of themselves and the children in the household.
