One of the oldest non-profit rehabs in the state of Oregon recently posted a blog talking about the link between cocaine and anxiety. Serenity Lane, with locations in Portland and beyond, has a long-standing history of helping their community learn about and heal from substance use. Their recent piece aims to highlight the link between cocaine and mental health conditions so people can better recognize when someone might be in need of help.

To start off the piece, Serenity Lane highlights how many individuals are truly impacted by anxiety or cocaine. Over 73,000 adults in Oregon reported engaging with cocaine at least once between 2021 and 2022. With 1 in 3 adults in Oregon also reporting symptoms of anxiety or depression, the likelihood of the two overlapping to some extent is very high.

Continuing on, readers will learn more about cocaine and how it impacts the body. Serenity Lane utilizes this information to showcase the connection between cocaine and anxiety. The blog explains how it's a result of both physical and mental side effects, not just one or the other. Not only does cocaine influence chemical production in the brain, but it also stimulates many of the same physical reactions that anxiety does.

Next, Serenity Lane educates readers on one of the primary systems cocaine interferes with ? dopamine production. Dopamine is the reward chemical produced by the brain when we do things like eat or have sex. It makes us feel happy and satisfied when we complete tasks, which in turn encourages us to be motivated to complete tasks in the future. They explain, Cocaine prevents the recycling of dopamine back into your system, leading to a build-up of dopamine in the body. This is what causes the feelings of euphoria associated with cocaine use. As cocaine leaves the body and dopamine levels return to normal, it can leave you feeling bereft, even though you're back at your baseline. For many, this decrease in dopamine can lead to increased feelings of depression or anxiety.

One of the biggest questions they answer in their blog is if cocaine causes anxiety or if it only worsens pre-existing anxiety. The answer to both is yes: Cocaine use, over time, can lead to the development of mental health conditions such as anxiety. At the same time, if someone is already managing an anxiety disorder and starts regularly engaging with cocaine, it can impact their already existing condition.

To wrap up the piece, Serenity Lane educates readers on co-occurring disorders and how two conditions like a cocaine use disorder and anxiety can interact. They highlight resources for readers so they know what to do should they wish to seek treatment for either of these conditions, whether for themselves or a loved one. Those who wish to learn more about cocaine and anxiety can read the blog post at the link above.
