January 28, 2016 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Rightnow Products Limited, a company that provides knee braces and operates from central Hong Kong, wants to draw attention to a new piece of research on knee injuries during skiing accidents. Current medical procedures almost always recommend surgery. However, whether the patient opts for surgery or not, Rightnow wants to point to the fact that "studies have shown that knee braces can help to protect a busted knee from further injury." They are encouraging people, therefore, to try their knee braces, available through <http://www.amazon.com/dp/B016WQW7A6>, to protect themselves from injury while skiing and also to protect a busted knee from sustaining further injury in the case of an accident. Naturally, people do have to follow their physician's advice as well.

Eric Arnow, creator of Rightnow Products Limited's For-Knees braces says: "Skiing accidents often do a lot of damage to people's bodies. Broken bones are very common, which is one of the reasons why special insurance has to be taken out by skiers. Knee accidents, however, often require surgery and recovery times are very long. But research has found that wearing a knee brace can both protect the knee from becoming damaged while skiing, and help to protect an injured knee from further damage." Of course, while the use of knee braces can protect the knee, given the nature of skiing, there can be no guarantee against injury by using any knee brace or appliance. People, likewise should consult their physician in the event of knee pain.

The knee braces that Rightnow Products Limited has developed have proven to be very popular. People across all ages and abilities have used them to improve their mobility and protect their bodies. They have a number of specific features, as can be seen on www.for-knees.com/features, which are scientifically proven to deliver results. While the company has not released their product to address a specific type of knee injury, they are happy to hear that it has been found so beneficial for injuries that happen during skiing.

The research that Rightnow Products Limited is drawing attention to can be found at <http://www.piquenewsmagazine.com/whistler/busted-knees-and-broken-legs/Content?oid=2746396>. Various hints and tips are highlighted to help prevent injuries in the first place. Most importantly, it touches on how to protect the body from further injuries later on. "Once back on the slope, studies have shown that knee braces can help to protect a busted knee from further injury." These braces have also been found to make skiing more comfortable overall.
