Baltimore County Urges Pet Adoptions Amid Rising Strays and Surrenders

May 19, 2025

Baltimore, MD - May 19, 2025 -
The Canine Club, a dog care and boarding service in Baltimore, is stepping up to help with the pet overpopulation problem by encouraging dog adoption and fostering in the local area. As Baltimore County shelters report an increase in stray and surrendered animals, the company is joining forces with authorities to urge residents to provide these animals with loving homes. This comes as many families face tough financial times, causing them to give up their pets, which adds strain on the community's resources.

Shelters in Baltimore County are seeing more stray and surrendered animals, causing overcrowding issues. This situation highlights the need for more people to adopt or foster pets to ease this pressure. "Stray and Surrender Rates Up in Baltimore County says Jay Mueller of The Canine Club at Locust Point," underlining the urgent call for community support.

The Canine Club offers various dog care services, which can greatly help those who are thinking about adopting a pet. They provide dog daycare, dog boarding sleepovers, and professional grooming. These services help ensure pets are well taken care of, which can make owning a pet easier for families.

"Our dog daycare services include play areas and supervised activities, ensuring dogs remain socialized and well-cared for when their owners are unavailable," said Jay Mueller from The Canine Club. "We think that with the right care, education, and support, more families can welcome these wonderful animals into their homes."

For those thinking about adopting, The Canine Club not only provides grooming to help dogs look and feel their best but also offers peace of mind with live webcams. This feature lets owners watch their dogs during their stay, providing reassurance. This service aims to make the adoption process smoother by assuring owners that their pets are happy and safe.

Baltimore County Executive Kathy Klausmeier has been actively urging the community to get involved. She encourages those who can adopt or foster to visit local shelters. These shelters are open every day of the week with hours that suit different schedules, making it easier for people to meet the animals needing homes.

Given the economic difficulties leading more people to surrender their pets, it's crucial to raise awareness about this issue. Taking care of a pet can be more manageable with options like dog boarding and daycare at places like The Canine Club, which could help ease the pressure on shelters. Adopting a pet not only provides a home for an animal in need but also frees up resources at shelters to help others.

Jay Mueller emphasizes that these efforts are important, saying, "it's both a collective responsibility and an act of compassion to consider adoption as an option. With more participation from residents, we can significantly mitigate the challenges posed by the increase of strays and surrender rates."

The Canine Club is working with community leaders and animal welfare groups to provide ongoing support and resources to tackle the problem of pet abandonment. By encouraging open dialogue and action on animal adoption, they hope to strengthen the bonds between people and pets, aiming for a pet-friendly community in Baltimore County.

Residents are invited to reach out to The Canine Club or local shelters to learn about adoption, fostering, or volunteering. More information on the company's services, including dog daycare, boarding, and grooming, is available on their website. Through teamwork and shared efforts, The Canine Club is striving to create a supportive atmosphere for both pets and families, working toward a brighter future for all animals in Baltimore County.
