Vilchis Tree Service Pro Releases New Summer Safety Blog to Help Georgia Homeowners Protect Trees from Storm Damage

June 27, 2025

DALLAS, GA - June 27, 2025 -
Douglasville, GA ? Vilchis Tree Service Pro has published its latest blog article, ?Top Tips for Preventing Tree Damage During Georgia?s Summer Storms,? available now on the company?s website. The new blog post provides detailed and clear advice for Georgia homeowners who want to keep their trees safe during the intense summer storm season.

The company?s marketing director, Alex Laldin, emphasized the need for public awareness, especially as unpredictable weather events continue to increase in frequency. ?Georgia experiences strong storms every summer,? Laldin said. ?What many homeowners don?t realize is that preparation before the storm can prevent expensive and dangerous damage. Our new blog is meant to give people straightforward, reliable advice that?s easy to understand and apply.?

The blog explains several risk factors that make trees more vulnerable to storm damage, including dead limbs, poor tree structure, and shallow roots. The content avoids technical jargon, focusing instead on practical steps that homeowners can take, such as regular tree inspections, proper pruning, and the importance of working with professionals for high-risk trees.

?Simple steps like clearing away weak limbs or ensuring trees aren?t leaning too much toward the house can make a major difference during high winds,? Laldin added. ?We want to educate property owners so they can act early, rather than face a dangerous emergency situation later.?

The release of the blog reflects Vilchis Tree Service Pro?s continued effort to engage with the local community and provide value beyond just offering services. The company views education as a key part of its mission, especially given how often tree care is overlooked until a crisis occurs. According to the blog, many cases of tree failure during storms could have been avoided with routine care and basic hazard recognition.

With the start of hurricane season and high humidity bringing thunderstorms throughout the state, the timing of the blog is intentional. ?We always see a spike in emergency calls this time of year,? Laldin explained. ?But many of those calls could have been avoided if the property had received a simple assessment or pruning in the spring. We?re hoping this blog helps people take that step now.?

The post also addresses common misconceptions about tree safety. One point the company stresses is that even healthy-looking trees can become unstable if the soil around the roots becomes too saturated. In Georgia?s clay-heavy soils, this is a common and often overlooked danger. The blog recommends homeowners look for signs of soil movement around tree bases after heavy rain and highlights the value of professional input.

Laldin noted that the blog isn?t just about prevention. It also covers what to do after a storm, including checking for cracks or splits in the trunk, looking for hanging branches, and calling a certified tree expert instead of trying to fix damage without the right equipment. ?Safety is our top concern,? Laldin said. ?We never want someone to get injured trying to clean up storm debris on their own.?

The company encourages readers to share the blog with neighbors and family members, particularly those who may have older or large trees on their property. While some homeowners may delay tree work due to cost concerns, Vilchis Tree Service Pro points out that prevention is far less expensive than emergency removal or home repairs caused by fallen trees.

The article?s message is clear: informed decisions now can prevent serious consequences later. As storms become more frequent and powerful, homeowners across Georgia must treat tree safety as a key part of property maintenance. Vilchis Tree Service Pro hopes the blog will serve as a wake-up call and resource for those who may not realize the risks around them.

For those who are unsure about the condition of their trees, the company offers inspections and consultations that can identify threats before disaster strikes. ?We?re always available to help our community prepare,? said Laldin. ?This blog is just one part of our commitment to keeping homes and families safe during storm season.?
