Pedestrian deaths make up 18% of all traffic fatalities across the country. Georgia's fatality rate is higher, at 1.68 deaths per 100,000 people. This situation is not only affecting the national statistics but also points out why it's crucial to push for better safety measures at the local level. Ross Moore Law wants to lead efforts to create a safer environment for Georgia residents, where infrastructure and awareness work together to protect everyone.

A representative from Ross Moore Law stated, "The rise in pedestrian fatalities is a sobering reminder that we must act collectively to protect lives. The statistics show that walking in our communities, particularly in Marietta, presents significant dangers. Enhancements are needed for both infrastructure and awareness, and Ross Moore Law stands ready to support the Marietta community in this mission."

Drivers are an essential part of pedestrian safety. It's critical to have more education programs for drivers, helping them learn how to navigate busy roads and residential areas responsibly. Drivers need to be aware of pedestrian crossings and pathways, exercise caution at intersections, and stay alert in areas with low visibility. This approach aims to foster an environment where drivers take responsibility for pedestrian safety.

Ross Moore Law stresses that victims of pedestrian accidents must understand their legal rights. Sandy Moore from Ross Moore Law explained, "For those affected by these tragic incidents, knowing their rights is critical. Legal recourse should be clear and accessible, ensuring that victims are adequately supported throughout the process." As a pedestrian accident attorney, the firm is committed to helping these victims seek justice and compensation for their suffering. Infrastructure changes could involve expanding pedestrian zones, adding better lighting, installing pedestrian-friendly traffic signals, and improving signage to guide drivers and pedestrians alike. These changes, along with well-planned public education campaigns, can greatly reduce the number of accidents and offer a safer urban environment.

Ross Moore Law stands with the Marietta community to push for these improvements. They invite victims and families affected by pedestrian incidents to seek guidance and support. By advocating for these enhancements and focusing on the rights of accident victims, the firm aims to drive major improvements in public safety.

Local news outlets in Atlanta and Marietta, along with traffic safety publications and community papers, have an essential role in raising awareness about this issue.
