Mogy Law Tennessee Addresses Rising Motorcycle Accidents and Rider Bias in Personal Injury Claims

October 27, 2025

MEMPHIS, TN - October 27, 2025 -
Mogy Law Tennessee is highlighting critical concerns about the increasing number of motorcycle accidents across Tennessee and the persistent bias motorcyclists face when pursuing personal injury claims. The Memphis-based firm is emphasizing its commitment to protecting riders' rights while offering more favorable contingency fee structures than typical law firms in the region.

"Motorcyclists face an uphill battle from the moment an accident occurs," said Eric Mogy, founding partner at Mogy Law Tennessee. "There's an unfortunate bias that assumes riders are reckless or at fault, even when evidence clearly shows another driver's negligence caused the collision. As a motorcycle accident lawyer myself, I've seen how insurance companies exploit these prejudices to minimize or deny legitimate claims."

Tennessee has experienced a concerning trend in motorcycle accidents, with riders facing disproportionate risks on the road. According to state traffic data, motorcycle accidents account for a significant portion of serious injury cases, with the majority involving collisions where other vehicle drivers failed to see or yield to motorcyclists. In Memphis specifically, common causes include distracted driving, failure to check blind spots, and drivers making left turns directly into the path of oncoming motorcycles.

The firm reports that many motorcycle accidents involve another vehicle, with the most common scenario being a car or truck violating the motorcyclist's right of way. Despite these statistics, injured riders often encounter skepticism from insurance adjusters and even some legal representatives who may not fully understand the unique challenges motorcyclists face on Tennessee roads.

Mogy Law Tennessee distinguishes itself not only as a dedicated advocate for victims rights but also through its fee structure. While most personal injury firms in Tennessee charge a standard 33 percent contingency fee, Mogy Law Tennessee maintains a 25 percent contingency fee, allowing clients to retain more of their settlement or verdict awards.

"We believe injured motorcyclists shouldn't have to sacrifice a larger portion of their compensation just to get quality legal representation," Mogy explained. "Our lower contingency fee reflects our commitment to putting clients first, especially when they're already dealing with medical bills, lost wages, and property damage."

The firm's approach to motorcycle accident cases involves comprehensive evidence gathering, accident reconstruction when necessary, and aggressive advocacy against insurance companies that attempt to shift blame to riders. This includes challenging common misconceptions about motorcycle safety and educating juries about the reality of sharing the road with larger vehicles.

Road hazards present another significant danger for motorcyclists in Tennessee, including potholes, debris, and poorly maintained infrastructure that may be minor inconveniences for cars but potentially fatal for riders. The firm works to hold municipalities and property owners accountable when dangerous conditions contribute to accidents.

Mogy Law Tennessee provides comprehensive personal injury representation across Memphis and surrounding areas, handling cases involving all types of motor vehicle accidents. The firm also offers criminal defense services and landlord rights advocacy, maintaining a diverse practice focused on protecting clients' interests. With bilingual staff available, the firm serves both English and Spanish-speaking communities throughout the region.
