Claytor Noone Plastic Surgery Adds New Skincare Line to Treatment Options

November 10, 2025

PHILADELPHIA - November 10, 2025 -
Claytor Noone Plastic Surgery announced the addition of Hydrinity Accelerated Skin Science to its medical-grade skincare offerings. The Philadelphia-area practice made the announcement as part of its expansion of post-treatment care options for surgical and non-surgical patients.

Hydrinity Accelerated Skin Science utilizes proprietary hyaluronic acid technology with specialized delivery systems. The brand originated from regenerative medicine research and focuses on formulations designed to accelerate skin recovery and reduce post-procedure inflammation.

Dr. R. Brannon Claytor, board-certified plastic surgeon and Chief of Plastic Surgery at Main Line Health, said the practice selected Hydrinity based on clinical data supporting its use in sensitive skin conditions. "The formulations show measurable results in barrier function restoration, which is particularly relevant for patients recovering from aesthetic procedures," Claytor stated.

The skincare line joins existing medical-grade brands currently offered at the practice, including Valmont, Alastin, and ISDIN. According to practice representatives, the addition allows for more targeted product recommendations based on individual patient needs and recovery requirements.

Claytor noted a shift in patient preferences toward more natural-appearing results and overall skin health. "We're seeing increased requests from patients who want to feel confident without makeup," he said. "Many are specifically asking for treatments and products that improve their skin quality to the point where they feel comfortable going makeup-free in their daily lives."

Industry data indicates Hydrinity is currently distributed through approximately 2,500 professional practices nationwide. The brand has reported significant growth within the professional skincare market over the past two years, according to published industry reports.

The announcement comes amid broader trends in aesthetic medicine toward comprehensive care approaches that combine surgical interventions with medical-grade skincare protocols. Recent consumer surveys indicate increased interest in professional-grade products that support natural skin appearance without heavy cosmetic application.

"The integration of medical-grade skincare with our surgical and non-surgical treatments represents a significant evolution in patient care," Claytor explained. "We're finding that patients who maintain consistent professional skincare regimens often experience enhanced healing, improved long-term results, and greater satisfaction with their overall aesthetic outcomes. This holistic approach addresses not just immediate concerns but supports ongoing skin health."

Claytor Noone Plastic Surgery operates from Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania, serving the greater Philadelphia metropolitan area. The practice specializes in facial and body contouring procedures, with additional non-surgical treatment options available through its medical spa division.

The practice's licensed medical aesthetician conducts skincare consultations to determine appropriate product selections for individual patients. Treatment plans may incorporate multiple product lines depending on specific skin conditions and recovery timelines.

Claytor noted that patient interest in achieving natural-looking results has influenced both surgical technique preferences and post-treatment care protocols. "We're seeing more requests for approaches that enhance rather than dramatically alter appearance," he said. ?We've also found that patients who stick to their post-surgical skincare routines are consistently happier with their results and maintain their improvements longer."

The Hydrinity product line will be available to current and new patients following consultation with the practices? skincare specialists. Information about available treatments and products can be obtained through the practice's website or by scheduling a consultation.
