Vyvo Therapeutics Announces Launch of IV Therapy Service

November 17, 2025

November 17, 2025 -
Vyvo Therapeutics has announced the launch of its IV therapy service, now available at its medical spa located at 2817 W Loop 250 N Suite A in Midland. The development introduces a structured menu of IV infusions formulated with vitamins, minerals, and physician-ordered medications, marking an expansion of clinical offerings intended to broaden the organization?s wellness-focused services. According to the company, the launch reflects growing interest in professionally administered infusion options within supervised settings.

?Introducing IV therapy required careful planning to ensure that each formulation was administered under appropriate clinical protocols,? said Neil Doctor, a representative of Vyvo Therapeutics. ?Our team concentrated on standardizing preparation procedures and ensuring that clients receive clear information about what each infusion contains.?

The new service includes a range of infusions that vary by composition. Each option is prepared on site and delivered by trained staff. Formulations incorporate combinations of B-complex vitamins, mineral blends, amino acids, and certain physician-ordered medications. The organization has stated that all preparations follow established guidelines for sterile compounding and infusion safety, with procedures designed to align with typical medical spa standards. This approach positions the new service as an operational expansion rather than a shift in the organization?s scope of practice.

Several of the offered infusions focus on providing mixtures that contain components commonly used in clinical environments. One formulation includes B-complex vitamins combined with Toradol, Zofran, and Dexamethasone, representing a blend of nutrients and medications administered under supervision. Another infusion incorporates B-complex vitamins, minerals, Pepcid, Zofran, and Toradol. A separate option mirrors the same structure while adding a multivitamin solution sometimes referred to as a ?Meyer?s Cocktail,? a mixture that has been used for decades in clinical and wellness settings. These descriptions reflect the organization?s emphasis on sharing factual ingredient information without characterizing outcomes.

Other formulations are based on vitamins and amino acids. One infusion includes a B-vitamin complex, ascorbic acid, and biotin. Another is structured around the Meyer?s Cocktail mixture and contains vitamin C, zinc, and a range of B vitamins. Vyvo Therapeutics has positioned these combinations as standardized preparations made available for clients seeking professionally administered vitamin and mineral infusions. The organization has emphasized that the introduction of these mixtures represents an expansion of available services rather than an endorsement of any specific physiological effect.

The service menu also includes options that incorporate taurine, an amino acid routinely referenced in nutrition and sports contexts, combined with vitamin C and a B-complex mixture. A separate formulation uses Toradol, a vitamin B complex, and magnesium chloride. Across all offerings, the company maintains that its focus remains on transparent ingredient disclosure and adherence to medical spa protocols. No claims of performance, treatment, or comparative advantage have been included in the company?s announcement, consistent with industry guidelines for neutral press communications.

Vyvo Therapeutics reports that the development of its IV therapy program included logistical adjustments to accommodate storage, handling, and preparation of infusion materials. Staff completed training related to infusion setup, patient monitoring, and administrative procedures. The organization states that these operational measures were required to support the expansion and to ensure a consistent client experience aligned with regulatory expectations for medical spas. The addition of IV therapy also prompted updates to internal documentation systems and scheduling processes to manage infusion appointments.

Founded as a medical spa offering services within a supervised clinical environment, Vyvo Therapeutics provides a range of procedures overseen by licensed professionals. The organization?s facility is structured to support services that require controlled preparation, with designated areas for equipment, documentation, and client monitoring. The launch of IV therapy builds upon this infrastructure and introduces new service lines designed around formulations that follow standard ingredient profiles commonly used within wellness and infusion settings. The company has indicated that it plans to continue evaluating which formulations may be added over time based on operational feasibility.

Vyvo Therapeutics operates at its Midland location and maintains a public website where additional information about its services and staff can be accessed. The organization notes that its objective is to provide clear descriptions of available procedures while maintaining compliance with the expectations placed on medical spas by state and local regulators. Updates about future service expansions or operational changes will be posted through official communication channels.
