December 02, 2025 -
Markhoff & Mittman, P.C. has announced the expansion of its workers? compensation legal services with additional attorney coverage now available to individuals in Goshen, NY, an adjustment intended to align with recent increases in workplace injury claims reported across several sectors. The firm stated that the expansion is effective immediately and reflects a broader internal initiative to allocate resources where case demand has grown.

?Expanding attorney availability in this area allows us to address changes in case volume while maintaining consistent legal support for injured workers,? said Brian M. Mittman, managing attorney at Markhoff & Mittman, P.C. ?Our goal is to ensure that individuals who need guidance on work-related injury claims have access to clear information about their legal options.?

The expansion forms part of a wider review undertaken by the firm during the last year to assess regional filings across workers? compensation boards and administrative offices. This assessment identified patterns in claim types that included repetitive-stress injuries, transportation-related incidents, and injuries associated with equipment handling. The firm?s leadership determined that increasing attorney availability in Goshen would support case intake related to these developments, particularly for individuals navigating administrative hearings and documentation requirements.

Markhoff & Mittman, P.C., founded in 1933, handles matters involving workers? compensation claims, Social Security disability filings, and associated administrative processes. The firm operates offices across several regions within New York State and coordinates case assignments according to attorney licensing, caseload capacity, and procedural needs. Its workers? compensation practice centers on state-regulated benefits for individuals who sustain injuries during the course of employment, including claims involving medical coverage, wage-replacement calculations, and schedule-loss evaluations.

Workers? compensation cases often require detailed documentation involving medical evaluations, employer reports, and statutory deadlines. The firm?s attorneys review records to determine whether injuries meet statutory definitions and whether additional filings are required to preserve benefit eligibility. Case preparation may involve assembling medical narratives, reviewing employer communications, and preparing claimants for administrative hearings before state workers? compensation judges. These procedures follow established guidelines and vary depending on the nature of the injury and the evidence provided.

The firm?s decision to broaden its service coverage also incorporates recent procedural adjustments at state agencies that oversee workplace injury claims in Goshen, NY. Several administrative offices have introduced updated digital submission systems intended to streamline document intake. These systems require accurate data entry and timely submission, elements that can influence the speed at which cases proceed. Markhoff & Mittman, P.C. indicated that its attorneys and staff have completed training on these updates to ensure compliance with current filing standards.

In-house operations at the firm include staff responsible for intake, case coordination, and communication with medical providers. These roles support attorneys by gathering initial information and ensuring that necessary forms are completed according to state requirements. The firm maintains internal checklists for document tracking and collaborates with outside specialists when independent medical evaluations are required. These procedures aim to maintain consistency across cases while aligning with statutory obligations for workers? compensation claims.

Goshen serves as a location where industrial, transportation, and service-sector employers contribute to a varied landscape of workplace injury types. The firm noted that its expanded service presence will support individuals across these sectors by offering access to attorneys familiar with the administrative structure governing workers? compensation within New York State. This approach is aligned with the firm?s broader objective of ensuring accessible legal information in regions experiencing higher claim activity.

Markhoff & Mittman, P.C. also maintains online resources that outline general processes involved in filing workers? compensation claims, including timelines, documentation categories, and typical stages of case review. These materials provide explanations of how state boards evaluate claims and the procedural steps individuals may encounter. Additional updates related to the firm?s expanded service capacity will be available through its official website, where individuals may learn more about its practice areas. Information about attorney profiles and organizational history can be accessed through the firm?s company page.
