A business in Carson City, NV, is helping people prepare themselves for long term disasters. If a long term emergency were to occur, food would start to run out. History has shown that having a seed vault is essential to survival of not just individuals, but the human race as a whole. As a result, the company has developed a high quality heirloom survival seed vault to help people be prepared in case of a disaster. The survival food seed bank is proving to be very popular.

Chuck Harmon from Home and Garden America says: "We all hope that a really big disaster never happens. But what if it does? We have created a survival seed package that ensures people are able to reseed their land, thereby not just ensuring they have food to eat, but that they protect plants as well. The seed vault takes up very little space, which means it can easily be added to any survival kit bug out bag. It really is an essential addition for any prepper."

The kit comes in an easy to store box and holds up to 105 varieties of plants. Additionally, all the plants will produce new seeds when planted, which means the vault will never have to run out of seeds if managed properly. The box itself is incredibly sturdy and is designed to survive any type of disaster. While most people are interested in it because of the potential it offers for their own survival, it is also recognized that Home and Garden America is offering a way to actually protect the flora of our planet.

Those who have purchased the seed vault have been overwhelmingly positive. One happy customer, for instance, has mentioned just how happy she is with the product, and how she has decided to give some of these as Christmas gifts. Additionally, she mentioned how happy she was with the level of customer service provided.

People are encouraged to like the company's Facebook fan page to be kept up to date with future developments, promotions and hints and tips on how to use the seed bank.
