The survival industry and Home and Garden America, in particular, have set the standard for quality information that can be used for long term survival of horrific disasters. In line with this, Home and Garden America, a survivalist company based in Carson City, Nevada, has recently released an emergency food survival seed bank onto the marketplace. Since its launch, the product has gained mass popularity, in part due to the informative downloadable content that comes with the kit.

Industry experts have indicated that it's smart to store seeds for a long term emergency situation just like the svalbard_global_seed_vault in Norway has been doing for years. Home and Garden America's seed vault is designed specifically for long term use. The company states that aside from the fact that it comes in a .30 caliber ammo box that is water resistant, the specific seeds chosen for the kit are designed to provide food for many years into the future.

Chuck Harmon, CEO of Home and Garden America, states, "Using the downloadable PDF that is provided with each survival seed vault, people can safely store seeds for decades." And there is where the information lies. The company includes a downloadable guide with the purchase of its ammo box seed vault, that helps consumers with planting and growing their non GMO survival seeds, and gives pertinent information regarding how to properly store the seeds for future planning, which Harmon says is very important.

"You want to know that you are going to get years of food from this kit," the CEO states. "Our guide is designed to help you to do just that."

Chuck Harmon says that Home and Garden America has been providing information to consumers about survival for the past three years, and that they continue to increase and improve on the information that they offer. He states that the PDF file is the latest in an attempt to ensure that every consumer has the information they need readily at their fingertips in the event that a catastrophe happens.

More about Home and Garden America and their seed vault kit can be seen on their official website.
