Carson City, NV company Home and Garden America has created a lot of buzz on social media with regards to their survival garden seeds. They have been sharing information on how to plant the seeds, harvest new seeds from them and store them in an effort to show people how they can protect the planet. The company has highlighted that seed banks have been essential to human survival at many points during the planet's history, and they want to make sure everyone is able to play their part in the survival of the planet if an emergency should happen again.

Chuck Harmon, the brains behind Home and Garden America, says: "We love plants, and we understand like no other how important plants are to the survival of our species and the planet as a whole. We want to make sure that as many people as possible are able to grow their own food and create more seeds so that, should a long lasting disaster happen, the planet can be rebuilt. We are so happy to see that this idea is catching on, and on social media in particular."

The company is using various social media channels to explain what an emergency food survival seed is all about. They offer a full kit of seeds, which contains 105 different plants. All these plants produce edible crops, and also new seeds, thereby ensuring that people can feed themselves and leave something behind for the next generation as well.

The company is particularly pleased to see that people are using the social media sites to ask questions about how best to use the survival seeds kit, and that other people are responding when they can. "Afternoon from N. Dallas, I am in need of your advice please," says Edee Z on Facebook. "I am a first time seeder and gardener. I have found a place in my yard for my veggie seedlings. We have added organic soil to the soil. The seedlings have been in their tray and shaded, is it ok to plant them now? I think they are ready to be planted but not sure." People are encouraged to share information with each other as much as possible.
