A company in Carson City, NV, Home and Garden America, has announced with pride that their survival seeds vault has already received 38 reviews on Amazon.com. This seed bank has been designed to enable people not just to grow their own crops, but also to protect the planet as well, as the seeds are all natural and not genetically modified. Additionally, should a disaster happen, it means that the people who have purchased the seed bank will have the ability to grow new crops as well. The company has noted with pride that the survival seeds vault reviews are very positive.

"We wanted to do something different," says Home and Garden America's Chuck Harmon. "There are lots of products on Amazon that promote organic growing of crops, and there are lots of products that focus on survival. To ensure that we are unique, we wanted to do something that offered both, giving people the chance to grow their own food and play their part in ensuring the survival of the species and the planet itself. It is so nice to see that people are appreciating our product."

In the various reviews, people have highlighted how well the products germinate, with some reporting a 100% germination, noting that everything that they have planted has actually sprouted, which is quite rare in the world of seeds and planting. The customers have also been very positive about the storage container itself, and the large variety of seeds that are provided.

Of importance to Home and Garden America is also the fact that many people have commented on the various reviews, asking questions about how they can best benefit from the seeds themselves. In so doing, they are creating an interesting buzz on the subject itself. Additionally, it is an opportunity for the company to speak directly to their customers.

While there is a chance that a large disaster will never come, it is always better to be safe than sorry. History has shown that creating seed banks is vital to the planet's recovery after a disaster, and giving people the opportunity to do this themselves is proving to be very popular.
