March 25, 2016

March 25, 2016 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Since its launch just a short time ago, the new survival seed vault by Home and Garden America has seen massive sales. The Carson City, Nevada based company reports that sales for this product have hit amazingly high levels over the past few weeks. Chuck Harmon, a spokesperson for the company, recently stated that, "We were a bit surprised by the high volume of orders that we saw initially, even though we know that this is something that every consumer needs."

The survival seed vault is packed inside a .30 caliber lockable ammo box with an O-ring seal, so it keeps the seeds protected from moisture and other damage. It contains a number of vegetable seed varieties from different species of tomatoes to corn, eggplant, and others, as well as fruits and melons.

The company is currently offering the ammo box survival seed vault on their eCommerce website as well as on the Amazon marketplace, where reviews have skyrocketed since its initial launch as well. "Not only are sales up," states Harmon. "But reviews on Amazon have been amazing. People are loving the emergency seeds vault."

Chuck Harmon reports that the seed vault saw high sales volumes within just the first weeks of its launch. The company then released a video outlining the vault's benefits and why consumers need the seed vault, and sales increased further.

Reviews on the Amazon marketplace have been predominately five stars, with most customers highly recommending the seed vault kit to other consumers. The company states that they took into account long term food supply when designing the kit, which contains seeds that can be used to grow food that will in turn, produce new seeds that consumers can store and then plant again when needed.

Harmon says that it is specifically designed to provide food for many years, which is one reason he states that sales are up. The company reports that they have seen no lull in sales since the product first hit the market and that they expect those numbers to continue to climb as more and more consumers learn about the ammo box seed vault.
