BETTENDORF, Iowa - January 06, 2026 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Nikki Sailor ? REALTOR in the Quad Cities is leading a series of public information sessions connected to the ongoing development of Johnson Farms Estates, a new residential community currently under construction in Le Claire, Iowa. The sessions are part of a structured effort to provide verified project information as the development advances toward its scheduled model home opening in 2026.

Johnson Farms Estates is being built by Aspen/Windmiller and remains in an active construction phase. Sailor has been appointed as the real estate agent for the development and is responsible for buyer-facing communication during the pre-model stage. Her role centers on providing accurate updates related to the project?s scope, construction timeline, and residential planning considerations while development continues.

The information sessions are being held at 5167 Lakeside Court in Bettendorf, Iowa, from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m., with dates scheduled throughout January and February 2026. The sessions are designed to allow prospective buyers to engage with the project at different points in its development, offering continuity as construction milestones are reached prior to on-site model availability.

Although hosted in Bettendorf, the Johnson Farms Estates in Le Claire, Iowa development is located north of the Quad Cities' urban core, within a community that has seen steady residential growth in recent years. Le Claire's location provides proximity to regional employment centers and established amenities while maintaining a smaller-community setting. The development reflects continued interest in new construction housing across eastern Iowa.

As the appointed agent, Sailor provides factual information regarding anticipated home designs, lot configuration, and projected construction phases as they are finalized by the builder. Because the official model home is scheduled to open on March 1, 2026, the information sessions currently serve as the primary forum for verified updates and buyer questions related to the development's progress.

This outreach approach aligns with common practices during early stages of residential development, when physical tours are not yet available. Structured information sessions allow prospective buyers to evaluate opportunities, understand timelines, and follow progress before model homes open. The format also supports ongoing engagement, enabling attendees to return as new details become available.

Regional housing data indicates that pre-model information sessions have become an increasingly common tool in new residential development, particularly in markets where construction timelines extend several months before public model access is available. By offering scheduled opportunities for discussion and updates, developers and appointed agents are able to maintain transparency while responding to buyer interest earlier in the process. In the Quad Cities area, this approach has been used to help prospective homeowners better understand how new developments integrate with surrounding communities, infrastructure, and school districts. For projects such as Johnson Farms Estates, early-stage engagement allows interested parties to monitor progress and evaluate options well ahead of formal sales activity.

The development has been positioned to address demand from specific segments of the local housing market. Publicly stated objectives include engagement with buyers connected to the Pleasant Valley School District, as well as empty nesters seeking newly built housing options that align with changing residential needs. These groups represent a consistent portion of interest in new construction within the Quad Cities region.

Sailor's involvement reflects a broader role beyond transaction representation, emphasizing buyer education during development and construction phases. By providing consistent access to factual project information, the sessions aim to reduce uncertainty and support informed decision-making as the development moves closer to completion.

By maintaining a regular schedule and a consistent location for its information sessions, the project's outreach reinforces regional accessibility while remaining grounded in the development's Le Claire location. As construction progresses toward the model opening, these sessions are expected to remain a central source of information for Pleasant Valley District buyers monitoring new residential development opportunities in eastern Iowa.
