Markhoff & Mittman, P.C. Workers? Compensation Practice Update Announced

January 12, 2026

January 12, 2026 -

Markhoff & Mittman, P.C. announced the release of an updated informational overview addressing recent procedural developments affecting workers? compensation claims in Newburgh, reflecting changes that took effect during the current year and their implications for injured employees and employers. The update was prepared by attorneys within the firm?s workers? compensation practice and is intended to summarize filing timelines, administrative review processes, and documentation standards as interpreted under current state guidance. Brian Mittman, Esq., a partner with the firm, said the update was developed to organize publicly available information into a single reference focused on procedural clarity rather than advocacy.

The overview outlines how workers? compensation claims are initiated, reviewed, and adjudicated within the state system, including the role of the Workers? Compensation Board and administrative law judges. It explains how claims progress from initial reporting through medical evaluation and, when necessary, formal hearings. The document also addresses common reasons claims are delayed or disputed, such as incomplete filings or disagreements over medical evidence, using neutral descriptions of the process rather than case-specific outcomes.

Markhoff & Mittman, P.C. was established in 1977 and operates as a professional corporation providing legal representation in several practice areas, including workers? compensation and personal injury matters. The firm maintains offices serving clients in multiple regions of New York, including the Hudson Valley, and employs a staff that includes attorneys, paralegals, and administrative personnel. Its workers? compensation law firm focuses on navigating administrative procedures established by state law rather than courtroom litigation alone.

According to the firm, the updated overview also addresses recent administrative adjustments affecting electronic filing systems and hearing formats. These procedural changes have altered how documentation is submitted and reviewed, particularly in cases involving ongoing medical treatment or contested disability classifications. The firm notes that understanding these mechanics can help claimants and employers anticipate the sequence of events in a claim and the types of records typically requested by the Board.

?Workers? compensation is governed by a detailed administrative framework, and periodic updates help ensure that information reflects how the system is operating in practice,? said Brian Mittman, Esq., partner at Markhoff & Mittman, P.C. He added that the firm periodically reviews public guidance and statutory amendments to determine when explanatory materials should be revised to remain current.

The overview includes background on benefit categories recognized under New York law, such as temporary and permanent disability classifications, without assigning monetary values or predicting outcomes. It also describes how medical providers, insurers, and employers interact within the system, emphasizing the procedural obligations assigned to each participant. By focusing on structure rather than results, the document is intended to function as a general reference rather than individualized legal advice.

Markhoff & Mittman, P.C. reports that its workers? compensation practice regularly monitors legislative and regulatory activity affecting claim administration. This monitoring includes reviewing published decisions, rulemaking notices, and administrative bulletins issued by state authorities. When substantive changes occur, the firm evaluates whether its publicly available materials require revision to reflect updated procedures or terminology.

The firm?s office serving the Newburgh area provides access to attorneys familiar with workers? compensation proceedings conducted in the region, although the firm notes that claims are administered at the state level under uniform rules. Its practice involves representing injured workers in NY in communications with insurers and appearances before administrative bodies, consistent with the requirements set out in state statutes and regulations.

Additional information about the firm and its practice areas is available through Markhoff & Mittman, P.C. The updated overview is part of a broader collection of educational materials the firm maintains to explain legal processes in neutral terms. For more information, please visit their website.
