

Sullivan Brill Personal Injury Attorneys Expands Medical Malpractice Focus

January 14, 2026 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Sullivan Brill Personal Injury Attorneys announced an enhancement to its medical malpractice representation, reflecting an expanded internal focus on claims involving alleged negligence by healthcare providers. The development applies to the firm's personal injury practice and is intended to address the procedural and evidentiary demands associated with medical malpractice litigation. The announcement was made this month from the firm's New York office as part of an ongoing evaluation of practice areas that require specialized legal resources.

"Medical malpractice cases involve detailed records, expert analysis, and close attention to professional standards of care," said Steven Brill, partner at Sullivan Brill Personal Injury Attorneys. "The firm has taken steps to concentrate additional internal resources on these matters to ensure they are handled with the level of preparation these cases require."

Medical malpractice claims arise when healthcare professionals such as physicians, nurses, dentists, hospitals, or other medical entities are alleged to have departed from accepted standards of care. These cases often involve complex factual questions related to diagnosis, treatment decisions, surgical procedures, or post-operative care. The legal process typically requires the review of medical records, consultation with independent medical experts, and adherence to jurisdiction-specific procedural rules.

Sullivan Brill Personal Injury Attorneys was established to handle personal injury litigation, including matters involving medical negligence. The firm's work in this area has included claims alleging surgical errors, delayed diagnoses, medication-related issues, and failures in follow-up care. These cases may involve significant documentation and extended timelines due to the technical nature of the allegations and the need for expert testimony.

The firm's medical malpractice work is conducted within the framework of New York civil procedure and evidentiary standards. Cases typically require coordination with medical experts, review of treatment records, and compliance with statutory requirements related to notice and filing. This structured approach reflects the firm's broader litigation practices and its emphasis on managing cases that involve technical subject matter and extended discovery timelines.

The enhanced focus on medical malpractice attorney representation includes a structured approach to case intake and evaluation. Potential claims are reviewed to determine whether the alleged conduct meets the legal threshold for malpractice under applicable law. This process involves analyzing whether a provider owed a duty of care, whether that duty was breached, and whether the breach is alleged to have caused identifiable harm. Such assessments are a foundational component of malpractice litigation and are necessary before a claim proceeds.

Medical malpractice litigation also intersects with broader issues of patient safety and professional accountability. Courts examining these cases consider whether healthcare providers followed established protocols and whether institutions maintained appropriate oversight. Claims may be brought against individual practitioners, medical groups, or healthcare facilities, depending on the circumstances alleged. Outcomes can include monetary damages intended to address medical expenses, lost income, or other documented losses, as determined by the court or through settlement.

Sullivan Brill Personal Injury Attorneys operates from its office at 110 E 59th St, Floor 23, New York, NY 10022, and represents individuals in personal injury matters under New York law. The firm's attorneys handle litigation across multiple stages, including investigation, filing, discovery, and trial preparation. Medical malpractice matters are managed within this broader litigation framework, with attention to statutory requirements such as filing deadlines and expert certification rules.

The firm has been in practice for more than a decade and focuses on personal injury claims that require detailed factual development. Its attorneys work with external medical professionals when expert analysis is necessary to evaluate claims or present evidence. This collaboration is a standard component of malpractice litigation and is governed by evidentiary rules applicable in civil courts.
