Colavecchio & Colavecchio Law Addresses Growing Demand for Marriage-Based Immigration Services

January 15, 2026 -
Colavecchio & Colavecchio Law, a family-owned immigration law firm in Nashville, Tennessee, reports increased inquiries for marriage-based green card applications and spouse visa services as international couples navigate complex immigration requirements in 2026.

The firm, which has over 10 years of experience in immigration law, has observed a notable rise in clients seeking assistance with marriage-based immigration cases, including K-1 fiance visas, spouse visas, and marriage-based green cards. This trend reflects broader national patterns as more Americans form relationships across international borders through digital platforms and increased global mobility.

"The marriage-based immigration process involves multiple federal agencies, extensive documentation requirements, and strict timelines that can overwhelm couples trying to start their lives together," said a representative from Colavecchio & Colavecchio Law. "Each case requires careful attention to detail, from initial petitions through adjustment of status applications, and any mistakes can result in significant delays or denials."

As an Immigration lawyer Nashville residents have turned to for various immigration matters, the firm handles the full spectrum of family-based immigration cases. The services extend beyond initial applications to include responses to Requests for Evidence, handling Notice of Intent to Deny situations, and representing clients whose cases have been denied by USCIS Field Offices.

The complexity of marriage-based immigration has intensified as USCIS implements enhanced fraud detection measures and increases scrutiny of relationship documentation. Couples must now provide extensive evidence of their genuine relationship, navigate in-person interviews at USCIS field offices, and meet specific financial requirements through affidavits of support.

The firm also assists clients with removing conditions on green cards, a critical step for those who received conditional permanent residence based on marriages less than two years old at the time of approval. This process, which must be initiated within the 90-day window before the conditional green card expires, requires additional evidence that the marriage remains valid and was entered in good faith.

Beyond marriage-based cases, the Immgration Attorney in Nashville provides comprehensive immigration services including citizenship and naturalization applications, work authorization, travel documents, waivers of inadmissibility, and petitions for parents, children, and siblings of U.S. citizens and permanent residents. The firm also specializes in complex cases involving military families and those requiring immigration waivers due to prior inadmissibility issues.

The increased demand for marriage-based immigration services coincides with processing delays at USCIS service centers nationwide, making professional legal guidance particularly valuable for couples hoping to avoid unnecessary setbacks in their immigration journey.

Colavecchio & Colavecchio Law maintains offices in Nashville and provides representation for clients throughout Tennessee dealing with immigration matters. The firm's team combines legal expertise with practical experience navigating the USCIS Nashville Field Office and other federal immigration agencies, offering clients guidance through each stage of the immigration process from initial consultations through final approval of permanent residence or citizenship applications.
