Based in Warwichshire, UK, SlowFoodNation, a site that regularly reviews consumer products, has announced the release of a new review. The site has recently reviewed a product with Ginkgo Biloba, which has for years been considered by some people to be a superfood for a number of reasons.

The review, written by George Nelson, gives a first-hand experience of using the product, and offers information regarding side effects, benefits, and where the superfood can be purchased.

The extensive review begins with explaining other products that the reviewer has offered information about including Matcha green tea power and Panax ginseng. It goes on to explain what Ginkgo Biloba is, what it is commonly used for, and where to find it.

"It's quite an extensive review for certain," states George Nelson. "I've given as much information as I possibly could so that consumers can make an informed decision about using this product for themselves."

In the review, Nelson explains that Ginkgo Biloba is said to offer a natural solution for memory and concentration improvement as well as cognition. It has often been said to be useful in removing tinnitus and slowing the effects of Alzheimer's development in patients who have been diagnosed with the disease. Nelson clarifies that he cannot have an unbiased opinion on these matters since he has neither of these problems, but does say that the effects of taking the product are somewhat immediate.

"I study molecular biology, so I go to lectures, seminars and readings daily and this has actually become much easier. I can stay focused for much longer," says Nelson in the review.

The review also states that Ginkgo Biloba differs significantly from other natural supplements such as Chia seeds and pine or bee pollen, in the sense that it goes directly to the head, while others work more on general fatigue and energy. Nelson states that he instantly began to focus more clearly and comprehend even the most complicated of statistics after taking the product for a few days.

Those interested in reading the entire review, or any of the reviews posted by SlowFoodNation, can do so by visiting the company's official website at http://slowfoodnation.org/ginkgo-biloba/. The company points out that they are not selling the product, but they do make a recommendation on the best quality stores where it is available.
