Purcellville, VA - The Washington Post recently showcased a news story relating how common a problem knife injuries can be. The Amazon vendor, Jenaluca, has stated that their product is a good tool to reduce bad incidents of these sorts of cuts in the kitchen.

The Washington Post covered the topic through an article written by their Food and Travel Editor Joe Yonan. The inspiration for the report came from Yonan injuring himself while preparing food in the kitchen. The injury was so dangerous, from a new ultra-sharp chef?s knife, that he had to go to the emergency room to have it fixed.

According to the article the kitchen may be considered the most dangerous room in the house. This is not only true because of the possibility of injury from knives but also due to other methods of injury. For example, there can be burns from oven or scalds from hot pots and oil. ?While burns can be painful, it?s the cuts that most often lead to the ER,? stated the article from the Washington Post.

The article reasoned that there were three main methods where people tended to cut themselves. These included ignorance of how to cut an unstable, often round, ingredient, the fact that a knife may be dull or because the knife is new, sharp and unfamiliar. Additionally they mentioned distractions to the activities in the kitchen that caused people to lose focus and cut themselves accidentally.

?We read with interest the article from The Washington Post about the possibility of knife injuries. We?ve found that our Stainless Steel Herb Scissors assists those in the kitchen to reduce incidents of cuts and nicks from a blade. The blades from the kitchen tool are finely balanced, easy to use and possess a strong handle. All these qualities ensure that the herb scissors remain a safe must-have gadget for the kitchen,? mentioned a spokesperson from Jenaluca.

One five star reviewer named Ruth remarked, ?These scissors are great! Used them on parsley. I got a really nice finished product in about 30 seconds with no danger for my fingers!?

The Jenaluca Herb Scissors are sold exclusively on the number one online marketplace, Amazon. It is made available with the convenient accessory cover.
