Diamond Haus Custom Jewelers Advances Custom Design Expertise with Addison Webster GIA Diamond Grading Completion

April 10, 2026

COLD SPRING, KY - April 10, 2026 -
Diamond Haus Custom Jewelers announced that jewelry designer Addison Webster has successfully completed the GIA Diamond Grading Lab course hosted by the Gemological Institute of America at the American Gem Society campus in Las Vegas. The intensive five-day program, which she finished this fall of 2025, equips her with advanced scientific knowledge of diamonds, marking a key step in her professional development within the family-owned business established in 1997.

The company, which operates as a full-service custom jewelry provider, integrates this new expertise into its established workflow. Addison Webster, known for her artistic approach to design, sought to deepen her understanding beyond aesthetics into the technical aspects of gemstones. The course focused on the science behind diamonds, including their formation, grading criteria, and distinguishing features. Participants engaged in hands-on laboratory work, evaluating stones under magnification, identifying clarity characteristics, recognizing subtle color variations, and assessing how cut proportions influence brilliance. Training also covered differentiation between natural diamonds, lab-grown stones, and simulants.

This achievement enhances the precision available in the company's custom jewelry process. Clients begin with consultations where ideas are discussed in detail. Designers then create CAD renderings informed by comprehensive gem knowledge. Wax models are carved, pieces cast in selected metals, gemstones set with accuracy, textures applied, and final polishing completed in-house. Addison Webster's training supports smarter stone sourcing and design decisions that honor the unique properties of each diamond, benefiting projects ranging from bridal sets to personalized heirlooms.

The business originated as Fort Thomas Jewelers, initially specializing in repairs and manufacturing for wholesale clients across local and national markets. It rebranded to Diamond Haus Custom Jewelers to emphasize retail custom work while retaining its manufacturing roots. Family involvement has been central, with co-owners Vincent Keairns and Renne Keairns overseeing operations. Daughters Bilinda and Taylor contribute actively: Bilinda manages the storefront and marketing, while Taylor, a GIA-certified gemologist, focuses on CAD designs and production. Additional team members, including Mirza Bosnjak with his MatrixGold CAD/CAM Artisan certification, complement these efforts. The group's combined experience exceeds 100 years of master craftsmanship.

Addison Webster's GIA training aligns with the company's commitment to ongoing professional growth. It represents one phase toward potential advanced credentials, such as Graduate Diamonds or Graduate Gemologist. Her enhanced skills allow for more confident client guidance on diamond selection, ensuring designs reflect both creative vision and technical integrity. This development strengthens the overall custom process, from initial concept to finished piece, across various budgets and styles.

Client interactions at the company often involve collaborative design sessions that draw on the team's expanded knowledge. Past examples include restorations of family heirlooms and creations of unique items that incorporate personal elements. The in-house capabilities enable control over quality at every stage, informed by a wholesale background that supports fair and transparent practices.

As the jewelry store in Cold Spring, KY, Diamond Haus Custom Jewelers serves the Northern Kentucky region and the broader Tristate area. The location facilitates walk-in consultations and scheduled appointments, making expert services accessible for those seeking specialized jewelry solutions. The business maintains a focus on empathy and integrity, treating each project as a meaningful contribution to clients' personal stories.

Vincent Keairns, co-owner, reflected on the team's progress: "Addison's completion of the GIA Diamond Grading Lab course brings scientific depth to our design capabilities, allowing us to elevate every custom piece with informed precision."

Renne Keairns, co-owner, added: "This type of professional development across our staff reinforces the expertise we provide, ensuring clients receive jewelry grounded in both artistry and gemological knowledge."

Beyond custom design, the company offers repair services for challenging pieces, including vintage or damaged items. Bridal jewelry remains a core area, with options for engagement rings and coordinating pieces. The team also participates in community events, such as appraisal and buying opportunities held in partnership with external specialists, fostering connections within the local area.

The integration of advanced training like Addison Webster's supports adaptation to industry standards while honoring traditional hand-forging techniques. These methods, combined with modern tools, produce durable and aesthetically refined jewelry suitable for everyday wear or significant occasions. Relationships with clients frequently span generations, with families returning for additional designs or maintenance.

Diamond Haus Custom Jewelers continues to prioritize in-house production to maintain efficiency and customization. The recent certification underscores the business's dedication to excellence in gemology and design. As the company moves forward, such milestones contribute to its role in creating pieces that hold value across lifetimes.

Diamond Haus Custom Jewelers is a family-owned enterprise specializing in custom jewelry design, manufacturing, and repair services. Based in Cold Spring, KY, it draws on more than 100 years of combined team experience to assist clients throughout the Northern Kentucky and Tristate regions with craftsmanship rooted in tradition and innovation.
