

Bad Highs Are on the Rise. But, So Is Florida's Response.

LARGO, FL - April 22, 2026 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

As marijuana legalization spreads across the United States and cannabis products are growing more potent than ever, a new and urgent conversation is starting to take shape in Florida treatment communities: what happens when a high goes wrong, and what it means when it keeps happening. Clean Recovery Centers, a dual diagnosis treatment provider operating across the Tampa Bay region, is addressing this head-on with a clinical resource that walks through the science of a bad high, the body's response to marijuana, and the point at which an unpleasant experience signals something deeper.

Clean Recovery Centers breaks down the biology in terms that cut through the noise. "The body has a natural way to keep your anxiety in check, and when you consume marijuana, the drug actually mimics this natural process. Marijuana impacts your endocannabinoid system, which calms down brain synapses responsible for stimulating various neurotransmitters. In other words, the endocannabinoid system slows the release of cannabinoids, which bind to cannabinoid receptors in the body and brain. When they are wired, they tell the body to remain calm. The problem arises when that system is overwhelmed. When the potency, quantity, or individual tolerance tips the balance from a nice, calm state into crisis, leaving the user in a spiral of paranoia, anxiety, and disorientation that can feel impossible to escape.

For people who are navigating marijuana use and wanting to understand the line between recreational consumption and dependency, Clean Recovery Centers has published a comprehensive resource that covers the full picture ? from the neuroscience of cannabis to the warning signs that occasional use has become something more. The organization treats recovery not as a single event but as a structured journey, guiding clients through its Preparation, Action, and Maintenance phases to address the whole person ? the mind, body, and spirit.

The resource outlines several clinically grounded steps for managing a bad high in the moment. "Don't Panic. Drink Liquids. Eat . Respect Your Tolerance Level. Chew Black Peppercorns. Relax or Take a Nap. Take a Walk.Engage in a Fun Activity." Each of these steps reflects some underlying principle ? whether that be grounding the nervous system, giving the body something concrete to process, or simply interrupting the feedback loop of anxiety that defines a bad high. As simple as these steps sound, they carry real clinical weight. This is especially the case for individuals in warm and high-stimulation environments like Florida, where heat and dehydration can significantly amplify the effects of cannabis.

The broader trend, however, is harder to manage with just a cold drink and a walk, though. Studies are now linking regular marijuana use to a significantly elevated risk of psychotic disorders, anxiety, depression, and substance use disorder. As Florida's cannabis market continues to expand with the rest of the country, and the THC concentrations that are in available products rise well beyond what previous generations ever encountered ? the likelihood of bad highs, dependency, and co-occurring mental health complications will only increase. A bad high is often the first signal the body sends. Whether that signal is answered will shape outcomes for a growing number of Floridians.

About Clean Recovery Centers: Clean Recovery Centers is one of the largest providers of dual diagnosis addiction and mental health treatment in Northwest Florida, operating six locations across the Tampa Bay area. The organization offers a full continuum of care and is in-network with nearly all major commercial insurance plans ? specializing in integrated treatment for co-occurring substance use and mental health conditions. With trauma-certified therapists, a culturally diverse staff, and many team members who are themselves in recovery, Clean Recovery Centers treats recovery as a lifelong journey, not a single destination.

Get Clean. Live Clean. Stay Clean.
