Front Yard Originals Highlights Shift Toward Year-Round Outdoor Decorations

April 24, 2026

LINDEN, MI - April 24, 2026 -

As homeowners continue to enhance their residential properties, a noticeable trend has emerged in the way outdoor spaces are decorated. Rather than limiting decorations to particular holidays, many are turning to designs that provide ongoing visual interest across multiple seasons. Front Yard Originals has observed this development in homeowner behavior, noting a move toward year-round outdoor decorations as part of the evolution of landscape aesthetics.

This change reflects a deeper integration of outdoor areas into everyday living. Homeowners are treating front yards and landscapes as extensions of their indoor environments, seeking to create cohesive looks that persist across the calendar. The inclusion of year-round outdoor decorations helps in achieving this goal by offering elements that do not require seasonal removal or replacement, thereby supporting greater usability of exterior spaces throughout the year.

Durability is central to this approach. The selection of appropriate materials enables decorations to endure the elements over time. Weather-resistant PVC, for example, offers resistance to fading and peeling, properties that are essential for prolonged outdoor exposure. Such materials ensure that the structural integrity and appearance of the displays remain intact through rain, sun, and temperature fluctuations common in various climates.

"Homeowners are increasingly seeking outdoor decorations that can contribute to the look of their properties throughout the seasons rather than being limited to temporary displays," said Shane Easler, partner of Front Yard Originals. "This shift is enabled by materials and designs that support prolonged exposure to the elements without compromising appearance or structure."

The structural design of these decorations also plays a critical role. Designs that incorporate stable bases and robust construction allow for safe and effective display in different weather scenarios. This engineering supports their use not just for short-term events but for sustained periods, contributing to the overall adaptability of outdoor spaces. Easy assembly features, such as tab and slot mechanisms, further simplify setup while maintaining stability once installed.

Visual continuity is another benefit associated with this trend. By choosing decorations that align with the home's architecture and landscape year-round, homeowners can maintain a polished and inviting appearance. This consistency enhances curb appeal and provides a sense of permanence and care for the property, reducing the visual disruptions that come with seasonal storage cycles.

Adaptability across seasons further drives the interest in these types of decorations. Themes that are versatile, such as wildlife or patriotic designs, can blend seamlessly into the environment at different times of the year. For example, animal silhouettes or eagle displays can complement spring, summer, fall, and winter settings without being tied to a specific celebration. The growing use of year-round outdoor decorations reflects homeowner preferences for flexibility that matches changing light, foliage, and activity levels in residential yards.

Practical considerations also influence homeowner choices. Durable items reduce the need for frequent maintenance or storage concerns associated with less robust options. This practicality aligns with busy lifestyles, where convenience and longevity are valued attributes in home improvements. Materials like waterproof PVC plastic foam board measuring 0.591 inches thick provide added strength, offering 18 percent more thickness than many alternatives. This board resists mold and mildew, does not rot or delaminate, and requires no painting, ensuring the displays perform reliably over extended periods.

Industry patterns indicate that as more homeowners adopt this mindset, the demand for versatile and durable outdoor decorations continues to develop. The focus remains on items that integrate well with natural surroundings and architectural styles. Life-size figures, silhouettes, and thematic displays manufactured with attention to weather resistance allow properties to retain their enhanced appearance consistently. This approach has implications for how front yards function as living extensions, where decorations contribute to enjoyment rather than serving as temporary accents.

Additional insights from industry participants indicate that the trend is gaining momentum as more people recognize the potential of their outdoor areas. The focus on quality and resilience allows decorations to become a fixture rather than a temporary addition, supporting sustained visual appeal and structural performance. Homeowners report satisfaction with options that withstand wind, moisture, and sun exposure while preserving their original form.

Shane Easler, partner of Front Yard Originals, further noted, "The feedback we receive highlights how the combination of material selection and thoughtful design allows for greater flexibility in outdoor décor choices, supporting the trend toward more consistent use."

Front Yard Originals specializes in the creation of outdoor decorations designed for yard displays. Their offerings include life-size nativity scenes, reindeer and sleighs, Bigfoot figures, yard silhouettes such as patriotic eagles, as well as designs for Halloween, animals and wildlife, Easter, and winter themes. All products are manufactured in the United States, utilizing materials selected for their suitability in outdoor conditions. The company's emphasis on durable construction aligns with the observed homeowner shift, providing options that meet practical needs for multi-season and year-round applications in residential settings.

The evolution toward year-round outdoor decorations underscores practical advancements in material science and design that address real-world environmental challenges. As properties evolve to prioritize extended outdoor living, the role of resilient displays becomes increasingly relevant in maintaining both functionality and aesthetic harmony across the full calendar year.
