May 14, 2026 -
Markhoff & Mittman, P.C., aka The Disability Guys, has announced an update to its work injury lawyer resources in May 2026, with information focused on workers? compensation procedures for injured workers in Brooklyn, New York. The update was issued to provide clearer public information about claim documentation, hearing procedures, and related legal processes.

?The firm?s recent content update is intended to organize workers? compensation information in a way that reflects the questions commonly raised after a workplace injury,? said Brian Mittman, Esq., managing partner at The Disability Guys. ?The materials describe procedural steps, filing considerations, and the role of legal representation in matters before the Workers? Compensation Board.?

The Disability Guys, also known as Markhoff & Mittman, P.C., represents workers in matters involving New York workers? compensation and Social Security Disability claims. The firm maintains offices in several New York communities, including White Plains, Westbury, Yonkers, and Poughkeepsie, according to its published office information. The Brooklyn resource page provides location-specific context while keeping the broader focus on New York workers? compensation law.

The updated materials explain that a work injury claim may involve notice to an employer, medical documentation, insurer review, and appearances before the New York State Workers? Compensation Board. The resources also describe how claims can involve disputed medical treatment, wage replacement issues, permanency evaluations, or questions about whether an injury arose in the course of employment. This information is presented as general legal education rather than a prediction of any case outcome.

Brooklyn workers may encounter work injury issues in construction, transportation, warehouse, health care, retail, building services, and office environments. The Disability Guys states that workers? compensation matters often require records showing when an injury occurred, how the injury was reported, and what treatment was provided. The firm?s updated page addresses these categories to give injured workers a clearer overview of the claim process.

Brian M. Mittman is identified by the firm as managing partner and as an attorney whose practice includes workers? compensation and Social Security Disability matters. His published profile lists Brooklyn Law School as his law school and describes his participation in continuing legal education programs involving workers? compensation topics. The firm also notes his involvement with professional organizations connected to injured workers and disability claims.

The work injury lawyer in Brooklyn updates describes the difference between workers? compensation claims and other injury-related legal matters. Workers? compensation is generally administered through an administrative system, while third-party claims may involve separate questions about responsibility by parties other than an employer. The Disability Guys presents this distinction to clarify why some work injury matters may involve more than one legal process.

The firm?s materials also address timelines, filings, medical records, hearings, and settlement discussions in workers? compensation matters. The resources state that case details can vary depending on medical evidence, insurer positions, job duties, wage records, and Board determinations. These subjects are included to provide procedural context without making comparative claims about outcomes.

The Disability Guys has published additional information about Brooklyn workers? compensation claims, disability claims, and related legal topics on its website. The firm?s New York workers? compensation section provides broader information about claim procedures, while the Brooklyn page focuses on work injury concerns connected to that area.
