Evergreen Landscape Pros Expands Landscape and Irrigation Services to Lamy, NM

SANTA FE, NM - July 08, 2026 -
The Santa Fe-based firm brings design, irrigation and water management support to homeowners in Lamy, New Mexico.

Evergreen Landscape Pros has expanded its landscape and irrigation services to Lamy, New Mexico, giving the community access to professional yard care. The Santa Fe-based firm, which serves ten communities across the greater Santa Fe area, is responding to rising demand for water-wise landscaping and reliable irrigation in northern New Mexico's high-desert climate.

Lamy sits about 18 miles south of Santa Fe and is home to fewer than 200 residents across roughly 1.1 square miles of high-desert terrain. The area's limited rainfall and exposed conditions make landscape design and installation, along with dependable irrigation, central concerns for property owners. Evergreen Landscape Pros offers Lamy residents the same range of work available across its service area, including planting, hardscape and stonework, fencing, and ongoing maintenance and restoration.

Properties in and around Lamy sit within a piñon and juniper landscape where native grasses, gravel beds, and drought-tolerant plantings are common. Landscaping in this setting typically favors xeric, low-water plants and careful grading to manage runoff on exposed slopes. The company plans new installations around the area's elevation and limited rainfall, selecting plant palettes and materials suited to high-desert conditions.

"Working in Lamy means respecting both the land and the way water moves through it," said Kevin Lopez, Owner of Evergreen Landscape Pros. "We want a yard here to look at home in the high desert and to hold up for years, not just for a season. That starts with thoughtful design and irrigation that does not waste a drop."

Demand for irrigation and water management has grown across northern New Mexico as water conservation becomes a larger consideration in how properties are planted and maintained. Evergreen Landscape Pros specializes in the installation, repair and maintenance of irrigation systems, paired with drought-tolerant planting designs suited to the region. The company also builds patios, portals and walkways and installs coyote, latilla, cedar and stone fencing for residential and commercial properties.

The company assesses each property individually before recommending a design or irrigation plan. "No two lots in the high desert drain or catch sun the same way," Lopez said. "We would rather spend time understanding a property up front than install something that fights the site later." Consultations cover soil, slope, existing vegetation and how a homeowner intends to use the space.

Lamy grew up around its rail line and remains a small, historic community, with a local museum dedicated to the area's railroad heritage. Many of its homes sit on larger, rural lots that call for fencing, stonework and erosion-conscious planting as much as ornamental design. The move extends the company's landscape and irrigation services across a contiguous stretch of communities south of Santa Fe, among them Eldorado and Galisteo, which the firm already serves.

In northern New Mexico, much of this work follows the seasons. New plantings and irrigation start-ups are typically scheduled for spring and early summer, while fall brings cleanup, soil preparation and the winterizing of irrigation lines before the first hard freeze. The company schedules installation and maintenance work around that cycle.

Based in Santa Fe, the company works across the surrounding corridor and serves both residential yards and commercial grounds. Projects range from new-construction landscapes to the restoration and upkeep of established properties.
