Positive Group LLC Releases Guide on When to Disclose Herpes While Dating

June 20, 2026

Chicago, Illinois - June 20, 2026 -
Positive Group LLC, the parent company of Meet Positives, has released comprehensive guidance addressing one of the most challenging aspects of dating with herpes: determining the appropriate time for disclosure. The educational resource provides individuals living with HSV-1 and HSV-2 with practical insights on navigating disclosure conversations in developing relationships.

The newly published guide acknowledges that deciding when to tell you're HSV positive when dating represents a significant concern for millions of Americans living with herpes. According to recent health statistics, approximately one in six people aged 14 to 49 has genital herpes, making disclosure conversations a reality for a substantial portion of the dating population.

"The question of disclosure timing weighs heavily on people who are newly diagnosed or returning to dating," said Michael Task, spokesperson for Positive Group LLC. "While there's no universal timeline that works for every situation, our guide helps individuals consider the key factors that lead to successful, respectful conversations about their HSV status."

The educational resource emphasizes that disclosure should occur after establishing basic trust but before any intimate physical contact. The guide outlines several critical considerations for timing these conversations, including the development of emotional connection, the progression of the relationship, and the comfort level of both parties involved.

Positive Group LLC's guidance stresses that disclosure represents an opportunity to build deeper trust and connection rather than an obstacle to overcome. The resource encourages individuals to approach these conversations with confidence, armed with accurate medical information about transmission risks and prevention methods.

The guide also addresses common misconceptions about herpes disclosure, clarifying that immediate disclosure on a first date is not always necessary or appropriate. Instead, the resource recommends allowing relationships to develop naturally while being mindful of the ethical obligation to inform partners before any risk of transmission occurs.

For those seeking additional support, the Meet Positives site for dating guidance offers a community where individuals can share experiences and learn from others who have successfully navigated disclosure conversations. The platform provides a space where members can practice discussing their status in a supportive environment before having these conversations with potential partners.

The educational resource acknowledges that fear of rejection often delays disclosure, but emphasizes that honest communication ultimately leads to healthier, more authentic relationships. The guide provides practical tips for preparing for disclosure conversations, including choosing appropriate settings, anticipating questions, and maintaining perspective regardless of the outcome.

"Supporting individuals through the disclosure process means providing them with tools to communicate effectively while maintaining their dignity and self-worth," added Task. "Our goal is to help people understand that having herpes doesn't diminish their value as partners or their ability to form meaningful connections."

The release of this guidance comes as dating platforms increasingly recognize the need for inclusive spaces that support individuals with various health conditions. HSV1 and HSV2 Dating with Meet Positives represents part of a broader movement toward reducing stigma and promoting open communication in modern dating.

Positive Group LLC operates Meet Positives, a specialized dating and support platform designed for individuals living with sexually transmitted diseases. The platform provides matching services, community forums, educational resources, and mobile applications that help members connect with others who share similar experiences while building confidence in dating and relationships.
