

Standard Fence Company Marks Its Fourth Generation in Business

June 25, 2026

DENVER, CO - June 25, 2026 -

Standard Fence Company, a family-owned fence and gate contractor founded in Denver in 1937, has entered its fourth generation of family ownership under president Taylor Scavo. The milestone marks nearly nine decades of continuous operation from the company's yard on East 64th Avenue, from which it serves residential, commercial, and agricultural clients across the Denver metropolitan area and the surrounding Front Range.

What began as a Scavo family lumber and hardware operation in 1937 gradually shifted toward fencing. The family added fence work in the 1960s as demand grew, and by 1984 the business had committed fully to the fencing and gate trade. Across four generations, that steady focus has kept the company a familiar name for Denver-area homeowners, businesses, and property managers, and operations have remained based at the same north Denver location for years.

Standard Fence Company is a member of the American Fence Association and its Colorado chapter, and it holds an A+ rating from the Better Business Bureau. The company remains bonded, licensed, and insured on the work it performs, and it reports more than 20,000 completed projects across the region over the course of its history.

"Reaching a fourth generation is not common in this trade, and it reflects the relationships this company has built in Denver over decades," said Taylor Scavo, president of Standard Fence Company. "Our aim has always been to keep the work and the accountability under one roof."

That approach is reflected in how the company operates day to day. Standard Fence Company uses in-house crews to handle each project from planning and permitting through site preparation, excavation, and installation. For metalwork, it maintains its own custom fabrication rather than relying on outside shops, which the company describes as a way to keep quality and responsibility within a single team.

The company installs fencing in a range of materials, including wood, vinyl, composite, ornamental iron and aluminum, chain link, brick, and precast concrete, in privacy, security, pool, and agricultural applications for homes and businesses. Material durability is a practical concern along the Front Range, where intense sun, freeze-thaw cycles, and wind affect how fences perform over time. The company also provides temporary fencing for construction sites and seasonal use, along with repair and maintenance services for existing fences.

Gate work has become a defined specialty for the company. Standard Fence Company builds and installs residential and commercial gates in swing, slide, cantilever, and other configurations, and it installs automated gate operators and access control systems such as keypad entry, card readers, and intercoms. Such systems have grown more common at commercial and industrial sites that need to manage entry, and the company works with operator manufacturers including LiftMaster, DoorKing, and Viking Access Systems.

To let clients coordinate an entire property perimeter through one contractor, the company pairs its fencing and gate work with in-house custom iron railings and masonry, including handrails, ornamental railings, retaining walls, and stone and brick work. These services are positioned as complements to its core fencing and gate business rather than separate divisions.

Standard Fence Company works with manufacturers including CertainTeed, Trex Fencing, Ameristar, and Jerith, among others, and it backs its projects with a limited lifetime warranty on workmanship and materials. The company serves the Denver metropolitan area and surrounding Front Range communities.

Under Scavo's direction, the company says it plans to continue investing in its crews, equipment, and product lines as it moves further into its fourth generation. "The goal for the next generation is the same as it was for the first," Scavo said. "Do the work well and stand behind it."
