

Big Dog Development Launches Home Remodeling Gallery

July 21, 2026

HARRISON, TN - July 21, 2026 -

Big Dog Development, a residential remodeling and custom home building contractor based in Harrison, Tennessee, has launched an online project gallery that documents completed renovations and ground-up homes across the greater Chattanooga area. The gallery brings the company's completed work together in one place, giving homeowners a visual reference as they research and compare contractors for upcoming projects.

The contractor has worked in residential construction and remodeling for more than 13 years, serving Chattanooga, Harrison, East Ridge, and neighboring communities in southeastern Tennessee. The new section gathers a cross-section of that work in a single online location that prospective clients can browse on their own time.

Images in the gallery span the range of residential work the company handles, including kitchen and bathroom renovations, attic and basement conversions, exterior remodeling, and custom home builds and additions. Rather than isolated photographs, the collection is meant to show finished rooms and structures in the context of the spaces around them.

Many of the documented projects involve structural and cosmetic changes carried out together, such as reconfigured layouts, updated finishes, and additions that expand a home's usable square footage. Presenting these results visually gives prospective clients a sense of how a finished space differs from its starting condition, information that can be difficult to convey through text alone.

Presenting completed projects together allows site visitors to study layouts, material choices, and the relative scale of different jobs without contacting the company first. The approach reflects a common pattern in residential contracting, where homeowners frequently examine a builder's documented work before requesting an estimate or scheduling a consultation. Visual records also help set expectations about what a particular type of renovation can involve. The format can be useful for homeowners weighing whether to update a single room or pursue a larger renovation.

"The gallery gives homeowners a clearer picture of what each type of project involves before any work begins," said Matthew Shannon, owner of Big Dog Development. "Seeing finished kitchens, additions, and renovations side by side helps people understand the scope and the design choices that go into each one."

The documented projects follow the staged process the company applies to each job, which begins with an initial consultation and site evaluation and continues through design planning, permit acquisition, construction, and a final walkthrough supported by a warranty. The gallery is intended to present the outcomes of that process rather than serve as a step-by-step record, and it covers both single-room updates and full-home renovations. Photographs in the gallery correspond to the final stage of that sequence, after each project has been completed and handed over to the homeowner.

The gallery was published as part of a broader update to the company's website and reflects a move toward centralizing project documentation that had previously been spread across individual service pages. Consolidating the material in one place is intended to reduce the time prospective clients spend searching for relevant examples of completed work. The change also makes recently finished projects easier to feature without redesigning multiple pages.

The gallery sits alongside existing sections of the company's website that outline its services and construction process, allowing visitors to move between documented results and written explanations of how those results are produced. The page is publicly accessible and can be viewed without registration or contact information.

"A photograph often communicates more about a finished space than a written description can," Shannon said. "The intent is to let completed projects illustrate the kind of work involved, and to keep adding to the gallery as more jobs reach completion."

The project gallery presents the company's completed work to date. Each entry centers on photographs of the finished result. The collection is expected to grow as additional builds and renovations are finished and added to the record.
