Jumpin Joy Party Rentals Expands Website With Party Planning Guides, Safety Resources, and Event Checklists for Travis and Williamson County Families

June 26, 2026

Pflugerville, Texas - June 26, 2026 -
Jumpin Joy Party Rentals, a Pflugerville-based party rental company serving Travis and Williamson counties, has updated its website at jumpinjoypartyrentals.com with an expanded library of planning resources designed to help Central Texas families prepare for events that include inflatable rentals. The additions include guides covering how to select the right equipment for a backyard party, safety checklists for parents supervising bounce houses and water slides, and planning timelines for events ranging from birthday parties to neighborhood gatherings.

The new content reflects a broader mission the company has been developing since it began operations in 2023: to make inflatable safety and event planning knowledge as accessible as the rental equipment itself. The company provides bounce houses, water slides, combo bouncers, concessions, backyard games, and tables and chairs across its two-county service area, and its owner, Jack Rady, said the expanded website resources are a direct response to questions he encounters regularly from customers.

"When people call us to book a water slide or a bounce house, a lot of them are doing this for the first time,"

Rady said. "They have real questions about how much space they need, what age the equipment is right for, whether an adult should be watching the slide the whole time. We have always tried to answer those questions honestly on the phone, but we recognized that a lot of families are doing their research online before they ever pick up the phone. We wanted that same level of help to be waiting for them on our site."

The updated site now includes content that addresses inflatable safety from several angles. One section covers the importance of proper supervision ratios at inflatable events, explaining how the number of children using a unit at one time affects safety outcomes. Another section discusses site preparation, including how to clear and measure a backyard before scheduling a delivery, and what to do if weather conditions change on the day of an event. A planning checklist walks customers through the steps involved from the time they first consider renting an inflatable to the moment the equipment is picked up, covering questions about guest count, age range of participants, available electrical access, and local HOA requirements that sometimes affect whether an overnight rental is practical.

Rady said the decision to build out the safety content was deliberate, not incidental. "There is a lot of misleading information out there about inflatable safety," he said. "We see it on social media, we hear about it from customers. People sometimes assume that because an inflatable looks simple, there is nothing much to know about running it safely. That is not accurate. Weight limits matter. Supervision matters. Weather matters. We wanted to put straightforward, factual information in one place where people could read it before the truck shows up."

The company has also added content specific to different event types. Guides covering backyard birthday parties, school year-end events, and community gatherings are now available on the site, each addressing the particular logistical considerations that come with those formats. A family organizing a party for thirty children in a residential backyard faces different planning questions than a church hosting a hundred-person outdoor event, and Rady said the content tries to reflect that distinction rather than offering generic advice that applies to no one in particular.

Jumpin Joy Party Rentals holds general liability insurance, maintains its inflatables in compliance with Texas Department of Insurance inspection requirements, and performs equipment checks before each delivery. The company is a member of the Better Business Bureau and operates with professional setup and takedown included in all rentals. Rady said those operational standards inform the advice his company now shares publicly on the site.

"We inspect our equipment because the state requires it, but also because we believe it is the right thing to do," he said. "When we write about what families should look for when renting a bounce house from anyone, we are writing from the same standards we hold ourselves to. If that content helps someone make a better decision, even if they end up renting from someone else, that is a good outcome. An educated customer is a safer customer, and a safer customer is one whose kids are going to have a good time without anyone getting hurt."

The planning guides and checklists are available without a subscription or registration at jumpinjoypartyrentals.com. Rady said the company intends to continue adding content to the site as questions from customers surface new topics worth addressing. Upcoming additions are expected to include guidance on wet-use inflatables and backyard drainage considerations, and a breakdown of how rental period options, including single-day, full weekend, and Saturday-only rentals, affect event logistics differently.
