Mogy Law Tennessee Warns Motorcycle Riders Face Hidden Legal Risks After Accident Claims

July 01, 2026

MEMPHIS, TN - July 01, 2026 -
Mogy Law Tennessee is alerting motorcycle riders across the state about critical legal vulnerabilities that can significantly impact their ability to recover fair compensation following an accident. The firm, which has represented injury victims throughout Tennessee for over a decade, emphasizes that motorcyclists face unique challenges in the claims process that many riders discover too late.

Tennessee's roads have seen consistent motorcycle accident activity, with riders facing particular hazards from heavy commercial traffic, distracted drivers, and complex urban intersections. When accidents occur, the legal aftermath presents challenges that differ substantially from standard vehicle collision cases. Insurance companies frequently attempt to shift blame onto motorcyclists, using Tennessee's comparative fault rules to reduce or deny compensation.

"Motorcycle accident victims encounter some of the most aggressive tactics from insurance companies in personal injury law," said Eric Mogy, founder of Mogy Law Tennessee Personal Injury Lawyer. "Insurers understand that juries often view riders less sympathetically than other accident victims, and they leverage this perception strategically. Without proper documentation, immediate medical attention, and a clear understanding of Tennessee's fault rules, riders can inadvertently weaken their own claims before consulting legal counsel."

The firm highlights several critical factors that motorcyclists should understand. Evidence from accident scenes can disappear quickly, including skid marks, debris patterns, and witness availability. Insurance adjusters often contact victims within hours of an accident, seeking recorded statements before riders fully understand their injuries or legal rights. Tennessee's modified comparative fault system allows insurers to reduce payouts based on any percentage of fault attributed to the rider, even when the other driver bears primary responsibility.

Mogy Law Tennessee distinguishes itself through both legal expertise and fee structure. The firm charges a 25 percent contingency fee, compared to the industry standard of 33 to 40 percent, allowing clients to retain more of their settlements. The practice has earned recognition including Super Lawyers and Rising Stars designations for Eric Mogy, along with a Top 10 Best of the Best Attorneys designation.

"The days and weeks following a motorcycle accident are crucial for preserving evidence and protecting legal rights," added Mogy. "We encourage riders to seek legal guidance before providing statements to insurance companies or accepting initial settlement offers, which are often far below the actual value of their claims."

The firm serves clients from offices in both Memphis and Nashville, with bilingual English and Spanish staff ensuring language accessibility for all clients. As a Memphis Accident Lawyer, the firm handles various personal injury cases including motorcycle, car, truck, rideshare, bus, and pedestrian accidents, along with criminal defense matters.

Mogy Law Tennessee provides comprehensive legal services for individuals injured due to others' negligence. The firm's attorneys bring extensive experience navigating Tennessee law and understanding local traffic patterns, which proves valuable in building strong cases for clients. The practice operates on a contingency basis, meaning clients pay nothing unless the firm secures compensation for their case. Free case reviews are available for potential clients seeking to understand their legal options.
