The Dumpster Co. Launches Free Online Resource Library for Homeowners and Contractors Across Middle Georgia

July 01, 2026

JACKSON, GA - July 01, 2026 -

The Dumpster Co., a locally owned roll-off dumpster rental company headquartered in Jackson, Georgia, announced the launch of its Dumpster Rental Resource Library, a free collection of planning guides and articles. The library is designed to help homeowners, contractors, and property managers across middle and north-central Georgia make informed decisions before renting a container, covering topics that range from choosing the right size for a specific project to understanding the permit requirements city by city across the company's 16-city service area.

The resource library launched with six guides, each written from the operational experience of the company's founders. The first guide, titled "Roll-Off vs. Front-Load Dumpster: Which One Do You Actually Need?" walks readers through the mechanical and contractual differences between the two primary container types, a distinction that the company says is frequently misunderstood by first-time renters and occasionally by contractors who regularly work with front-load service for ongoing commercial accounts. The second guide, "What Size Dumpster Do I Need? A Project-by-Project Guide," covers sizing recommendations for fifteen common project types, from garage cleanouts and single-room bathroom remodels to full-home estate cleanouts and commercial renovations. Both guides were developed in response to questions the company fields on the phone every week from customers who have reached the booking stage without yet having a clear sense of what they need.

The third guide in the library addresses one of the most common pre-booking questions the company receives: what can actually go in a roll-off dumpster and what cannot. "What Can You Throw in a Dumpster? The Complete Accepted Materials List" covers the full range of accepted household, yard, and construction debris, explains why concrete, brick, and asphalt require a separate container entirely, and details the prohibited items that generate the most confusion in practice, including paint cans, propane tanks, fluorescent tubes, and tires. The guide also provides disposal alternatives for each prohibited category, with references to Georgia Environmental Protection Division guidance and local options for household hazardous waste collection.

"People call us every day with the same handful of questions: what size do I need, what can I throw in, do I need a permit. Those questions have real answers, but the answers depend on the project, the location, and sometimes the specific material. We wanted to put all of that in one place so customers could get a straight answer before they pick up the phone, and so the conversation when they do call could start from a more informed place," said Joe Hardin, co-founder of The Dumpster Co.

The fourth guide, "How to Rent a Dumpster: A Step-by-Step Guide," walks through the full rental process from initial booking through final pickup, including how to prepare a drop location, how to load a container efficiently, when and how to request a mid-project swap-out, and what to do if a rental company fails to show up on the scheduled delivery day. The guide includes firsthand accounts from the company's co-founders drawn from six years of daily deliveries across Butts County and the surrounding region, including a specific account of a Hampton roofing job where an undersized container resulted in several hours of crew downtime and the economic cost of that delay relative to the price difference of booking one size up.

The fifth guide, "Estate Cleanout Dumpster Rental: A Practical Guide," addresses a project type the company describes as distinct from all other dumpster rental jobs it handles. Estate cleanouts involve not only logistical decisions about container sizing and swap-out scheduling but also the practical challenges of coordinating family members, separating items for donation from items for disposal, identifying prohibited materials in garages and basements that may have been accumulating for decades, and working around probate timelines and real estate closing dates. The guide covers each of these considerations in detail, including a checklist of ten steps specific to estate cleanout preparation and guidance on what can be donated locally versus what needs to go in the bin. A section on outbuildings addresses a recurring pattern the company has observed, in which estimates made based on the main living areas of a home consistently fail to account for what is stored in detached garages, workshops, and sheds.

The sixth and most locally specific guide in the library, "Do You Need a Permit for a Dumpster in Middle Georgia?," presents a city-by-city reference table covering all sixteen municipalities in the company's service area, from Jackson and McDonough to Milledgeville and Monticello. The guide establishes that driveway placement on private property requires no permit in any city in the service area, while street placement requires a right-of-way permit in most municipalities. The City of McDonough is identified as the jurisdiction the company's customers encounter most frequently in connection with the permit requirement, and a dedicated section covers the process for obtaining a right-of-way encroachment permit from the City of McDonough Public Works Department in detail. The guide also addresses the separate and often overlapping issue of HOA restrictions on container placement and rental duration, which the company notes can apply independently of what a given city's permit requirements do or do not require.

According to the company, the resource library is a continuing project. Additional guides covering roofing debris disposal, construction site waste management, driveway surface protection, and city-specific delivery guidance are in development and will be added to the library as they are completed. The guides are freely accessible without registration at mydumpsterco.com/dumpster-rental-resources/.
