Schuster Law Announces Expanded Focus on Maritime Accident Cases

July 02, 2026

MEDIA, PA - July 02, 2026 -
Schuster Law has announced an expanded focus on maritime accident litigation as part of its personal injury practice. The development reflects the firm's continued representation of individuals involved in injury claims and addresses the legal issues that can arise from accidents occurring on navigable waterways involving recreational boats, commercial vessels, docks, marinas, and related maritime operations.

"Maritime accident cases often involve legal issues that differ from other personal injury matters because they may be governed by federal maritime law in addition to state law," said Ken Schuster, Esq., attorney at Schuster Law. "Expanding the firm's focus in this area reflects the need to address those legal considerations while evaluating the facts of each individual case."

Maritime accidents may occur in a variety of settings, including boating collisions, ferry operations, commercial shipping activities, marina facilities, and waterfront construction projects. Depending on where an incident occurs and the parties involved, claims may fall under admiralty jurisdiction, state negligence law, or a combination of legal authorities. Determining the applicable legal framework is often an important part of evaluating a potential claim.

Investigations involving maritime incidents typically require the collection and review of multiple forms of evidence. Vessel maintenance records, navigation logs, weather reports, witness statements, accident reports, and applicable safety regulations may all be examined as part of the legal process. In some matters, expert analysis may also be used to evaluate vessel operation, mechanical conditions, or compliance with maritime standards.

Schuster Law has represented individuals in personal injury matters involving motor vehicle accidents, premises liability, workplace injuries, and other negligence claims. The firm's expanded maritime accident practice builds upon that experience by addressing cases involving injuries sustained on navigable waters and in maritime environments. These matters frequently involve legal questions that differ from those presented in traditional personal injury litigation.

Federal maritime law establishes legal principles that apply to many accidents occurring on navigable waterways within the United States. Certain statutes and judicial decisions address issues such as liability, damages, vessel operation, and the responsibilities of vessel owners and operators. In some situations, state law may also apply depending on the facts of the incident and the location where it occurred.

Maritime accident litigation may involve recreational boat operators, commercial shipping companies, passenger vessels, charter services, marina operators, contractors, maintenance providers, or equipment manufacturers. Cases involving multiple parties may require courts to evaluate the responsibilities of each entity based on contractual obligations, applicable regulations, and the available evidence. As with other civil litigation, each case is decided according to its individual facts and the governing law.

Personal injury claims arising from maritime accidents may involve allegations relating to operator negligence, equipment failure, unsafe conditions, inadequate maintenance, or violations of applicable safety requirements. The legal process may include negotiations with insurers, formal discovery, expert evaluations, and court proceedings when disputes cannot be resolved through settlement discussions. Timelines and procedural requirements can vary depending on the jurisdiction and the laws that govern the claim.

Schuster Law continues to represent clients in a range of personal injury matters while expanding its work involving maritime accident litigation. The firm stated that the expanded practice reflects the evolving legal needs associated with accidents occurring on navigable waterways and the distinct legal procedures that often accompany those cases.
