

SteelToe Digital Releases New Guide Highlighting Tree Service Companies Across America

July 29, 2026

KENNESAW, GA - July 29, 2026 -

SteelToe Digital has published a new educational guide, "The 20 Best Tree Service Companies in America (2026)," that highlights 20 tree service companies across the United States and explains the key factors homeowners should consider before hiring a contractor. The guide was recently added to the company's website to help readers make informed decisions when choosing a tree care professional.

The guide explains that tree work involves serious safety risks and encourages homeowners to verify a company's qualifications before any work begins. It recommends confirming that a company employs ISA Certified Arborists, carries liability insurance and workers' compensation coverage, provides written estimates, and maintains a consistent record of customer feedback. The article also discusses Tree Care Industry Association membership or accreditation as one indicator of a company's commitment to professional standards.

"The goal of this guide is to give homeowners a clear and practical way to evaluate tree service companies before making a hiring decision," said Alex Laldin, Marketing Director at SteelToe Digital. "Many people focus only on price, but credentials, insurance, and documented experience are just as important, especially when work involves large trees, structures, or power lines."

The guide features profiles of 20 tree service companies operating in different regions of the United States. The list includes both national and regional businesses that meet the evaluation criteria outlined in the article. According to the guide, the companies were selected using publicly available information, including professional credentials, insurance expectations, industry affiliations, customer review history, and years of operation.

In addition to identifying companies, the guide explains the qualities commonly found among established tree care providers. These include employing ISA Certified Arborists, maintaining proper insurance coverage, using professional equipment, providing written scopes of work, and completing thorough job site cleanup. The article notes that these practices help homeowners understand what to expect before work begins and reduce the risk of misunderstandings after the project is complete.

The guide also outlines several warning signs homeowners should recognize before hiring a contractor. It advises readers to use caution when approached by door-to-door operators following storms, when a company requests full payment before work begins, or when proof of insurance cannot be provided. The article also recommends avoiding businesses that pressure customers into making immediate decisions or lack a verifiable business presence and established customer history.

Beyond contractor selection, the guide discusses how successful tree service companies continue to grow after building strong local reputations. According to the article, many established businesses combine quality field work with a strong online presence, including a professional website, an updated Google Business Profile, and consistent visibility in local search results. These factors often make it easier for homeowners to find qualified providers when searching for tree services in their area.

The guide also answers several common homeowner questions about tree care. Topics include the difference between a tree trimmer and an ISA Certified Arborist, typical tree removal costs, permit requirements that may vary by municipality, and ways to verify an arborist's certification through the International Society of Arboriculture. The publication encourages homeowners to confirm a company's qualifications before scheduling work involving valuable trees or trees located near homes, fences, or utility lines.

SteelToe Digital regularly publishes educational resources covering digital marketing, home service businesses, and contractor-focused topics. The company said its latest guide is intended to provide practical information that helps homeowners make informed hiring decisions while promoting greater awareness of the professional standards commonly associated with established tree care companies.
